pay the tax, or such person may likewise make application for deductions to the collector of the district in which return is made or to be made for him: Provided, That the amount of the normal tax hereinbefore imposed shall be deducted and withheld from fixed and determinable annual gains, profits, and income derived from interest upon bonds, mortgages, or other indebtedness of corporations, joint-stock companies or associations, insurance companies, and also of the United States Government not now exempt from taxation, whether payable annually or at shorter or longer periods, although such interest does not amount to $4,000, subject to the provisions of this section requiring the tax to be withheld at the source and deducted from annual income; and likewise the amount of such tax shall be deducted and withheld from coupons, checks, or bills of exchange for or in payment of interest upon bonds of foreign countries and upon foreign mortgages or like obligations (not payable in the United States), and also from coupons, checks, or bills of exchange for or in payment of any dividends upon the stock or interest upon the obligations of foreign corporations, associations, and insurance companies engaged in business in foreign countries; and the tax in each case shall be withheld and deducted for and in behalf of any person subject to the tax hereinbefore imposed, although such interest, dividends, or other compensation does not exceed $4,000, by any banker or person who shall sell or otherwise realize coupons, checks, or bills of exchange drawn or made in payment of any such interest or dividends (not payable in the United States), and any person who shall obtain payment (not in the United States) in behalf of another of such dividends and interest by means of coupons, checks, or bills of exchange, and also any dealer in such coupons who shall purchase the same for any such dividends or interest (not payable in the United States), otherwise than from a banker or another dealer in such coupons; but in each case the benefit of the exemption and the deduction allowable under this section may be had by complying with the foregoing provisions of this paragraph.

Nothing in this section shall be construed to release a taxable person from liability for income tax.

The tax herein imposed upon annual gains, profits, and income not falling under the foregoing and not returned and paid by virtue of the foregoing shall be assessed by personal return. Any person for whom return has been made and the tax paid, or to be paid as aforesaid, shall not be required to make a return unless such person has other net income, but only one deduction of $4,000 shall be made in the case of any such person.

F. That if any person, corporation, joint-stock company, association, or insurance company liable to make the return or pay the tax aforesaid shall refuse or neglect to make a return at the time or times hereinbefore specified in each year, such person shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding $500. Any person required by law to make, render, sign, or verify any return who makes any false or fraudulent return or statement with intent to defeat or evade the assessment required by this section to be made shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be fined not exceeding $1,000 or be imprisoned not exceeding one year, or both, at the discretion of the court, with the costs of prosecution.

G. That the normal tax hereinbefore imposed upon individuals likewise shall be levied, assessed, and paid annually upon the entire net income arising or accruing from all sources during the preceding calendar year to every corporation, joint-stock company or association, and every insurance company, organized in the United States, no matter how created or organized, but not including partnerships; but if organized, authorized, or existing under the laws of any foreign country, upon the amount of net income arising or accruing by it from business transacted and capital invested within the United States during such year: Provided, however, That nothing in this section shall apply to labor, agricultural, or horticultural organizations, or to mutual savings banks not having a capital stock represented by shares, or to fraternal beneficiary societies, orders, or associations operating under the lodge system, and providing for the payment of life, sick, accident, and other benefits to the members of such societies, orders, or associations and dependents of such members, nor to domestic building and loan associations, nor to cemetery companies, organized and operated exclusively for the mutual benefit of their members, nor to any corporation or association organized and operated exclusively for religious, charitable, or educational purposes, no part of the net income of which inures to the benefit of any private stockholder or individual.

Second. Such net income shall be ascertained by deducting from the gross amount of the income of such corporation, joint-stock company or association, or insurance company, received within the year from all sources, (first) all the ordinary and necessary expenses paid within the year out of income in the maintenance and operation of its business and properties, including rentals or other payments required to be made as a condition to the continued use or possession of property; (second) all losses actually sustained within the year and not compensated by insurance or otherwise, including a reasonable allowance for depreciation by use, wear and tear of property, if any; and in the case of mines an allowance for depletion of ores and all other natural deposits on the basis of their actual original cost in cash or the equivalent of cash; and in case of insurance companies the net addition, if any, required by law to be made within the year to reserve funds and the sums other than dividends paid within the year on policy and annuity contracts: Provided further, That mutual fire insurance companies requiring their members to make premium deposits to provide for losses and expenses shall not return as income any portion of the premium deposits returned to their policyholders, but shall return as taxable income all income received by them from all other sources plus such portions of the premium deposits as are retained by the companies for purposes other than the payment of losses and expenses and reinsurance reserves; (third) interest accrued and paid within the year on its indebtedness to an amount of such indebtedness not exceeding its paid-up capital stock outstanding at the close of the year, or if no capital stock, the capital employed in the business at the close of the year: Provided, That in the case of bonds or other indebtedness, which have been issued with a guaranty that the interest payable thereon shall be free from taxation, no deduction for the payment of the tax herein imposed shall be allowed; and in the case of a bank, banking association, or trust company, interest paid within the year on deposits; (fourth) all sums paid by it within the year for taxes imposed under the authority of the United States or of any State or Territory, or Government of any foreign country, as a condition to carry on business therein: Provided, That in the case of a corporation, joint-stock company or association, or insurance company, organized, authorized, or existing under the laws of any foreign country, such net income shall be ascertained by deducting from the gross amount of its income received within the year from business transacted and capital invested within the United States (first) all the ordinary and necessary expenses actually paid within the year out of earnings in the maintenance and operation of its business and property within the United States, including rentals or other payments required to be made as a condition to the continued use or possession of property; (second) all losses actually sustained within the year in business conducted by it within the United States and not compensated by insurance or otherwise, including a reasonable allowance for depreciation by use, wear and tear of property, if any, and in the case of mines an allowance for depletion of ores and all other natural deposits on the basis of their actual original cost in cash or the equivalent of cash; and in case of insurance companies the net addition, if any, required by law to be made within the year to reserve funds and the sums other than dividends paid within the year on policy and annuity contracts: Provided further, That mutual fire insurance companies requiring their members to make premium deposits to provide for losses and expenses shall not return as income any portion of the premium deposits returned to their policyholders, but shall return as taxable income all income received by them from all other sources plus such portions of the premium deposits as are retained by the companies for purposes other than the payment of losses and expenses and reinsurance reserves; (third) interest accrued and paid within the year on its indebtedness to an amount of such indebtedness not exceeding the proportion of its paid-up capital stock outstanding at the close of the year, or if no capital stock, the capital employed in the business at the close of the year which the gross amount of its income for the year from business transacted and capital invested within the United States bears to the gross amount of its income derived from all sources within and without the United States: Provided, That in the case of bonds or other indebtedness which have been issued with a guaranty that the interest payable thereon shall be free from taxation, no deduction for the payment of the tax herein imposed shall be allowed; (fourth) all sums paid by it within the year for taxes imposed under the authority of the United States or of any State or Territory thereof as a condition to carry on business therein. In the case of assessment insurance companies the actual deposit of sums with State or Territorial officers, pursuant to law, as additions to guarantee or reserve funds shall be treated as being payments required by law to reserve funds.

Third. The tax herein imposed shall be computed upon its entire net income for the year ending December 31, 1913, and for each calendar year thereafter: Provided, however, That any corporation, joint-stock company or association, or insurance company subject to this tax may designate the last day of any month in the year as the day of the closing of its fiscal year and shall be entitled to have the tax payable by it computed upon the basis of the net income ascertained as herein provided for the year ending on the day so designated in the year preceding the date of assessment instead of upon the basis of the net income for the calendar year preceding the date of assessment; and it shall give notice of the day it has thus designated as the closing of its fiscal year to the collector of the district in which its principal business office is located at any time not less than 30 days prior to the date upon which its annual return shall be filed. All corporations, joint-stock companies or associations, and insurance companies subject to the tax herein imposed, computing taxes upon the income of the calendar year, shall, on or before the 1st day of March, 1914, and the 1st day of March in each year thereafter, and all corporations, joint-stock companies or associations, and insurance companies, computing taxes upon the income of a fiscal year which it may designate in the manner hereinbefore provided, shall render a like return within 60 days after the close of its said fiscal year, and within 60 days after the close of its fiscal year in each year thereafter, or in the case of a corporation, joint-stock company or association, or insurance company, organized or existing under the laws of a foreign country, in the place where its principal business is located within the United States, in such form as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe, shall render a true and accurate return under oath or affirmation of its president, vice president, or other principal officer, and its treasurer or assistant treasurer, to the collector of internal revenue for the district in which it has its principal place of business, setting forth (1) the total amount of its paid-up capital stock outstanding, or if no capital stock, its capital employed in business at the close of the year; (2) the total amount of its bonded and other indebtedness at the close of the year; (3) the gross amount of its income, received during such year from all sources, and if organized under the laws of a foreign country the gross amount of its income received within the year from business transacted and capital invested within the United States; (4) the total amount of all its ordinary and necessary expenses paid out of earnings in the maintenance and operation of the business and properties of such corporation, joint-stock company or association, or insurance company within the year, stating separately all rentals or other payments required to be made as a condition to the continued use or possession of property, and if organized under the laws of a foreign country the amount so paid in the maintenance and operation of its business within the United States; (5) the total amount of all losses actually sustained during the year and not compensated by insurance or otherwise, stating separately any amounts allowed for depreciation of property, and in case of insurance companies the net addition, if any, required by law to be made within the year to reserve funds and the sums other than dividends paid within the year on policy and annuity contracts: Provided further, That mutual fire insurance companies requiring their members to make premium deposits to provide for losses and expenses shall not return as income any portion of the premium deposits returned to their policyholders, but shall return as taxable income all income received by them from all other sources plus such portions of the premium deposits as are retained by the companies for purposes other than the payment of losses and expenses and reinsurance reserves; and in case of a corporation, joint-stock company or association, or insurance company, organized under the laws of a foreign country, all losses actually sustained by it during the year in business conducted by it within the United States, not compensated by insurance or otherwise, stating separately any amounts allowed for depreciation of property, and in case of insurance companies the net addition, if any, required by law to be made within the year to reserve funds and the sums other than dividends paid within the year on policy and annuity contracts: Provided further, That mutual fire insurance companies requiring their members to make premium deposits to provide for losses and expenses shall not return as income any portion of the premium deposits returned to their policyholders, but shall return as taxable income all income received by them from all other sources plus such portions of the premium deposits as are retained by the companies for purposes other than the payment of losses and expenses and reinsurance reserves; (6) the amount of interest accrued and paid within the year on its bonded or other indebtedness not exceeding its paid-up capital stock, outstanding at the close of the year, or if no capital stock, the amount of interest paid within the year on an amount of indebtedness not exceeding the amount of capital employed in the business at the close of the year, and in the case of a bank, banking association, or trust company, stating separately all interest paid by it within the year on deposits; or in case of a corporation, joint-stock company or association, or insurance company, organized under the laws of a foreign country, interest so paid on its bonded or other indebtedness to an amount of such bonded or other indebtedness not exceeding the proportion of its paid-up capital stock outstanding at the close of the year, or if no capital stock, the amount of capital employed in the business at the close of the year, which the gross amount of its income for the year from business transacted and capital invested within the United States bears to the gross amount of its income derived from all sources within and without the United States; (7) the amount paid by it within the year for taxes imposed under the authority of the United States and separately the amount so paid by it for taxes imposed by the Government of any foreign country as a condition to carrying on business therein; (8) the net income of such corporation, joint-stock company or association, or insurance company, after making the deductions in this subsection authorized. All such returns shall as received be transmitted forthwith by the collector to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

All assessments shall be made and the several corporations, joint-stock companies or associations, and insurance companies shall be notified of the amount for which they are respectively liable on or before the 1st day of June of each successive year, and said assessment shall be paid on or before the 30th day of June: Provided, That every corporation, joint-stock company or association, and insurance company, computing taxes upon the income of the fiscal year which it may designate in the manner hereinbefore provided, shall pay the taxes due under its assessment within 120 days after the date upon which it is required to file its list or return of income for assessment; except in cases of refusal or neglect to make such return, and in cases of false or fraudulent returns, in which cases the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall, upon the discovery thereof, at any time within three years after said return is due, make a return upon information obtained as above provided for, and the assessment made by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue thereon shall be paid by such corporation, joint-stock company or association, or insurance company immediately upon notification of the amount of such assessment; and to any sum or sums due and unpaid after the 30th day of June in any year, or after 120 days from the date on which the return of income is required to be made by the taxpayer, and for 10 days after notice and demand thereof by the collector, there shall be added the sum of 5 per cent on the amount of tax unpaid and interest at the rate of 1 per cent per month upon said tax from the time the same becomes due.

Fourth. When the assessment shall be made, as provided in this section, the returns, together with any corrections thereof which may have been made by the commissioner, shall be filed in the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and shall constitute public records and be open to inspection as such: Provided, That any and all such returns shall be open to inspection only upon the order of the President, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury and approved by the President.

If any of the corporations, joint-stock companies or associations, or insurance companies aforesaid, shall refuse or neglect to make a return at the time or times hereinbefore specified in each year, or shall render a false or fraudulent return, such corporation, joint-stock company or association, or insurance company shall be liable to a penalty of not exceeding $10,000.

H. That the word "State" or "United States" when used in this section shall be construed to include any Territory, Alaska, the District of Columbia, Porto Rico, and the Philippine Islands, when such construction is necessary to carry out its provisions.

J. That sections 3167, 3172, 3173, and 3176 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended are hereby amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 3167. It shall be unlawful for any collector, deputy collector, agent, clerk, or other officer or employee of the United States to divulge or to make known in any manner whatever not provided by law to any person the operations, style of work, or apparatus of any manufacturer or producer visited by him in the discharge of his official duties, or the amount or source of income, profits, losses, expenditures, or any particular thereof, set forth or disclosed in any income return by any person or corporation, or to permit any income return or copy thereof or any book containing any abstract or particulars thereof to be seen or examined by any person except as provided by law; and it shall be unlawful for any person to print or publish in any manner whatever not provided by law any income return or any part thereof or the amount or source of income, profits, losses, or expenditures appearing in any income return; and any offense against the foregoing provision shall be a misdemeanor and be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both, at the discretion of the court; and if the offender be an officer or employee of the United States he shall be dismissed from office and be incapable thereafter of holding any office under the Government.

"SEC. 3172. Every collector shall, from time to time, cause his deputies to proceed through every part of his district and inquire after and concerning all persons therein who are liable to pay any internal-revenue tax, and all persons owning or having the care and management of any objects liable to pay any tax, and to make a list of such persons and enumerate said objects.

"SEC. 3173. It shall be the duty of any person, partnership, firm, association, or corporation, made liable to any duty, special tax, or other tax imposed by law, when not otherwise provided for, in case of a special tax, on or before the 31st day of July in each year, in case of income tax on or before the 1st day of March in each year, and in other cases before the day on which the taxes accrue, to make a list or return, verified by oath or affirmation, to the collector or a deputy collector of the district where located, of the articles or objects, including the amount of annual income charged with a duty or tax, the quantity of goods, wares, and merchandise made or sold and charged with a tax, the several rates and aggregate amount, according to the forms and regulations to be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, for which such person, partnership, firm, association, or corporation is liable: Provided, That if any person liable to pay any duty or tax, or owning, possessing, or having the care or management of property, goods, wares, and merchandise, articles or objects liable to pay any duty, tax, or license, shall fail to make and exhibit a list or return required by law, but shall consent to disclose the particulars of any and all the property, goods, wares, and merchandise, articles, and objects liable to pay any duty or tax, or any business or occupation liable to pay any tax as aforesaid, then, and in that case, it shall be the duty of the collector or deputy collector to make such list or return, which, being distinctly read, consented to, and signed and verified by oath or affirmation by the person so owning, possessing, or having the care and management as aforesaid, may be received as the list of such person: Provided further, That in case no annual list or return has been rendered by such person to the collector or deputy collector as required by law, and the person shall be absent from his or her residence or place of business at the time the collector or a deputy collector shall call for the annual list or return, it shall be the duty of such collector or deputy collector to leave at such place of residence or business, with some one of suitable age and discretion, if such be present, otherwise to deposit in the nearest post office, a note or memorandum addressed to such person, requiring him or her to render to such collector or deputy collector the list or return required by law within 10 days from the date of such note or memorandum, verified by oath or affirmation. And if any person, on being notified or required as aforesaid, shall refuse or neglect to render such list or return within the time required as aforesaid, or whenever any person who is required to deliver a monthly or other return of objects subject to tax fails to do so at the time required, or delivers any return which, in the opinion of the collector, is false or fraudulent, or contains any undervaluation or understatement, it shall be lawful for the collector to summon such person, or any other person having possession, custody, or care of books of account containing entries relating to the business of such person, or any other person he may deem proper, to appear before him and produce such books, at a time and place named in the summons, and to give testimony or answer interrogatories, under oath, respecting any objects liable to tax or the returns thereof. The collector may summon any person residing or found within the State in which his district lies; and when the person intended to be summoned does not reside and can not be found within such State, he may enter any collection district where such person may be found and there make the examination herein authorized. And to this end he may there exercise all the authority which he might lawfully exercise in the district for which he was commissioned.

"SEC. 3176. When any person, corporation, company, or association refuses or neglects to render any return or list required by law, or renders a false or fraudulent return or list, the collector or any deputy collector shall make, according to the best information which he can obtain, including that derived from the evidence elicited by the examination of the collector, and on his own view and information, such list or return, according to the form prescribed, of the income, property, and objects liable to tax owned or possessed or under the care or management of such person or corporation, company or association, and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall assess all taxes not paid by stamps, including the amount, if any, due for special tax, income or other tax, and in case of any return of a false or fraudulent list or valuation intentionally he shall add 100 per cent to such tax; and in case of a refusal or neglect, except in cases of sickness or absence, to make a list or return, or to verify the same as aforesaid, he shall add 50 per cent to such tax. In case of neglect occasioned by sickness or absence as aforesaid the collector may allow such further time for making and delivering such list or return as he may deem necessary, not exceeding 30 days. The amount so added to the tax shall be collected at the same time and in the same manner as the tax unless the neglect or falsity is discovered after the tax has been paid, in which case the amount so added shall be collected in the same manner as the tax; and the list or return so made and subscribed by such collector or deputy collector shall be held prima facie good and sufficient for all legal purposes."

K. That it shall be the duty of every collector of internal revenue, to whom any payment of any taxes other than the tax represented by an adhesive stamp or other engraved stamp is made under the provisions of this section, to give to the person making such payment a full written or printed receipt, expressing the amount paid and the particular account for which such payment was made; and whenever such payment is made such collector shall, if required, give a separate receipt for each tax paid by any debtor, on account of payments made to or to be made by him to separate creditors in such form that such debtor can conveniently produce the same separately to his several creditors in satisfaction of their respective demands to the amounts specified in such receipts; and such receipts shall be sufficient evidence in favor of such debtor to justify him in withholding the amount therein expressed from his next payment to his creditor; but such creditor may, upon giving to his debtor a full written receipt, acknowledging the payment to him of whatever sum may be actually paid, and accepting the amount of tax paid as aforesaid (specifying the same) as a further satisfaction of the debt to that amount, require the surrender to him of such collector's receipt.

L. That jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the district courts of the United States for the district within which any person summoned under this section to appear to testify or to produce books shall reside, to compel such attendance, production of books, and testimony by appropriate process.

M. That all administrative, special, and general provisions of law, including the laws in relation to the assessment, remission, collection, and refund of internal-revenue taxes not heretofore specifically repealed and not inconsistent with the provisions of this section, are hereby extended and made applicable to all the provisions of this section and to the tax herein imposed.

N. That the provisions of this section shall extend to Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands: Provided, That the administration of the law and the collection of the taxes imposed in Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands shall be by the appropriate internal-revenue officers of those governments, and all revenues collected in Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands thereunder shall accrue intact to the general governments thereof, respectively: And provided further, That the jurisdiction in this section conferred upon the district courts of the United States shall, so far as the Philippine Islands are concerned, be vested in the courts of the first instance of said islands: And provided further, That nothing in this section shall be held to exclude from the computation of the net income the compensation paid any official by the governments of Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands or the political subdivisions thereof.

SECTION III.

A. That the act entitled "An act to simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenues," approved June 10, 1890, as amended, be further amended to read as follows:

"B. That all merchandise imported into the United States shall, for the purpose of this act, be deemed and held to be the property of the person to whom the same is consigned; and the holder of a bill of lading duly indorsed by the consignee therein named, or, if consigned to order, by the consignor, shall be deemed the consignee thereof; and in case of the abandonment of any merchandise to the underwriters the latter may be recognized as the consignee. That for the purposes of this act bringing or causing merchandise to be brought within the territorial limits of the United States shall be construed to be an attempt to enter or introduce the same into the commerce of the United States.

"C. That all invoices of imported merchandise shall be made out in the currency of the place or country from whence the importations shall be made, or, if purchased, or agreed to be purchased, in the currency actually paid, agreed upon, or to be paid therefor, shall contain a correct, complete, and detailed description of such merchandise and of the packages, wrappings, or other coverings containing it, and shall be made in triplicate or in quadruplicate in case of merchandise intended for immediate transportation without appraisement, and signed by the person owning or shipping the same, if the merchandise has been actually purchased, or price agreed upon, fixed, or determined, or by the manufacturer or owner thereof, if the same has been procured otherwise than by purchase, or agreement of purchase, or by the duly authorized agent of such purchaser, seller, manufacturer, or owner.

"D. That all such invoices shall, at or before the shipment of the merchandise, be produced to the consular officer of the United States of the consular district in which the merchandise was manufactured, or purchased, or contracted to be delivered from, or when purchases or agreements for purchase are made in several places, in the consular district where the merchandise is assembled for shipment, as the case may be, for export to the United States, and shall have indorsed thereon, when so produced, a declaration signed by the purchaser, seller, manufacturer, owner, or agent, setting forth that the invoice is in all respects correct and true and was made at the place from which the merchandise is to be exported to the United States; that it contains, if the merchandise was obtained by purchase, or agreement for purchase, a true and full statement of the time when, the place where, the person from whom the same was purchased, or agreed to be purchased, and the actual cost thereof, or price agreed upon, fixed, or determined, and of all charges thereon, as provided by this act; and that no discounts, rebates, or commissions are contained in the invoice but such as have been actually allowed thereon, and that all drawbacks or bounties received or to be received are shown therein; and when obtained in any other manner than by purchase, or agreement of purchase, the actual market value or wholesale price thereof, at the time of exportation to the United States, in the principal markets of the country from whence exported; that such actual market value is the price at which the merchandise described in the invoice is freely offered for sale to all purchasers in said markets, and that it is the price which the manufacturer or owner making the declaration would have received, and was willing to receive, for such merchandise sold in the ordinary course of trade in the usual wholesale quantities, and that it includes all charges thereon as provided by this act, and the actual quantity thereof; and that no different invoice of the merchandise mentioned in the invoice so produced has been or will be furnished to anyone. If the merchandise was actually purchased, or agreed to be purchased, the declaration shall also contain a statement that the currency in which such invoice is made out is that which was actually paid for the merchandise by the purchaser, or agreed to be paid, fixed, or determined.

"E. That, except in case of personal effects accompanying the passenger, no importation of any merchandise exceeding $100 in value shall be admitted to entry without the production of a duly certified invoice thereof as required by law, or of an affidavit made by the owner, importer, or consignee, before the collector or his deputy, showing why it is impracticable to produce such invoice; and no entry shall be made in the absence of a certified invoice, upon affidavit as aforesaid, unless such affidavit be accompanied by a statement in the form of an invoice, or otherwise, showing the actual cost of such merchandise, if purchased, or if obtained otherwise than by purchase, the actual market value or wholesale price thereof at the time of exportation to the United States in the principal markets of the country from which the same has been imported, which statement shall be verified by the oath of the owner, importer, consignee, or agent desiring to make entry of the merchandise, to be administered by the collector or his deputy, and it shall be lawful for the collector or his deputy to examine the deponent under oath, touching the sources of his knowledge, information, or belief in the premises, and to require him to produce any letter, paper, or statement of account in his possession, or under his control, which may assist the officers of customs in ascertaining the actual value of the importation or any part thereof, and in default of such production, when so requested, such owner, importer, consignee, or agent shall be thereafter debarred from producing any such letter, paper, or statement for the purpose of avoiding any additional duty, penalty, or forfeiture incurred under this act, unless he shall show to the satisfaction of the court or the officers of the customs, as the case may be, that it was not in his power to produce the same when so demanded; and no merchandise shall be admitted to entry under the provisions of this section unless the collector shall be satisfied that the failure to produce a duly certified invoice is due to causes beyond the control of the owner, consignee, or agent thereof: Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury may make regulations by which books, magazines, and other periodicals published and imported in successive parts, numbers, or volumes, and entitled to be imported free of duty, shall require but one declaration for the entire series. And when entry of merchandise exceeding $100 in value is made by a statement in the form of an invoice, the collector shall require a bond for the production of a duly certified invoice.

"F. That whenever merchandise imported into the United States is entered by invoice, a declaration upon a form to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, according to the nature of the case, shall be filed with the collector of the port at the time of entry by the owner, importer, consignee, or agent, which declaration so filed shall be duly signed by the owner, importer, consignee, or agent before the collector, or before a notary public or other officer duly authorized by law to administer oaths and take acknowledgments, under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That if any of the invoices or bills of lading of any merchandise imported in any one vessel which should otherwise be embraced in said entry have not been received at the date of the entry the declaration may state the fact, and thereupon such merchandise, of which the invoices or bills of lading are not produced, shall not be included in such entry, but may be entered subsequently.

"G. That if any consignor, seller, owner, importer, consignee, agent, or other person or persons, shall enter or introduce, or attempt to enter or introduce, into the commerce of the United States any imported merchandise by means of any fraudulent or false invoice, declaration, affidavit, letter, paper, or by means of any false statement, written or verbal, or by means of any false or fraudulent practice or appliance whatsoever, or shall make any false statement in the declarations provided for in paragraph F without reasonable cause to believe the truth of such statement, or shall aid or procure the making of any such false statement as to any matter material thereto without reasonable cause to believe the truth of such statement, or shall be guilty of any willful act or omission by means whereof the United States shall or may be deprived of the lawful duties, or any portion thereof, accruing upon the merchandise, or any portion thereof, embraced or referred to in such invoice, declaration, affidavit, letter, paper, or statement, or affected by such act or omission, such person or persons shall upon conviction be fined for each offense a sum not exceeding $5,000, or be imprisoned for a time not exceeding two years, or both, in the discretion of the court: Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to relieve imported merchandise from forfeiture by reason of such false statement or for any cause elsewhere provided by law.

"H. That if any consignor, seller, owner, importer, consignee, agent, or other person or persons shall enter or introduce, or attempt to enter or introduce, into the commerce of the United States any imported merchandise by means of any fraudulent or false invoice, declaration, affidavit, letter, paper, or by means of any false statement, written or verbal, or by means of any false or fraudulent practice or appliance whatsoever, or shall make any false statement in the declarations provided for in paragraph F without reasonable cause to believe the truth of such statement, or shall aid or procure the making of any such false statement as to any matter material thereto without reasonable cause to believe the truth of such statement, or shall be guilty of any willful act or omission by means whereof the United States shall or may be deprived of the lawful duties or any portion thereof, accruing upon the merchandise or any portion thereof, embraced or referred to in such invoice, declaration, affidavit, letter, paper, or statement, or affected by such act or omission, such merchandise, or the value thereof, to be recovered from such person or persons, shall be forfeited, which forfeiture shall only apply to the whole of the merchandise or the value thereof in the case or package containing the particular article or articles of merchandise to which such fraud or false paper or statement relates.

"I. That the owner, consignee, or agent of any imported merchandise may, at the time when he shall make entry of such merchandise, but not after either the invoice or the merchandise has come under the observation of the appraiser, make such addition in the entry to or such deduction from the cost or value given in the invoice or pro forma invoice or statement in form of an invoice, which he shall produce with his entry, as in his opinion may raise or lower the same to the actual market value or wholesale price of such merchandise at the time of exportation to the United States, in the principal markets of the country from which the same has been imported; and the collector within whose district any merchandise may be imported or entered, whether the same has been actually purchased or procured otherwise than by purchase, shall cause the actual market value or wholesale price of such merchandise to be appraised; and if the appraised value of any article of importer merchandise subject to an ad valorem duty or to a duty based upon or regulated in any manner by the value thereof shall exceed the value declared in the entry, there shall be levied, collected, and paid, in addition to the duties imposed by law on such merchandise, an additional duty of 1 per cent of the total appraised value thereof for each 1 per cent that such appraised value exceeds the value declared in the entry: Provided, That the additional duties shall only apply to the particular article or articles in each invoice that are so undervalued and shall not be imposed upon any article upon which the amount of duty imposed by law on account of the appraised value does not exceed the amount of duty that would be imposed if the appraised value did not exceed the entered value, and shall be limited to 75 per cent of the appraised value of such article or articles. Such additional duties shall not be construed to be penal, and shall not be remitted nor payment thereof in any way avoided except in cases arising from a manifest clerical error, nor shall they be refunded in case of exportation of the merchandise, or on any other account, nor shall they be subject to the benefit of drawback: Provided, That if the appraised value of any merchandise shall exceed the value declared in the entry by more than 75 per cent, except when arising from a manifest clerical error, such entry shall be held to be presumptively fraudulent, and the collector of customs shall seize such merchandise and proceed as in case of forfeiture for violation of the customs laws, and in any legal proceeding other than a criminal prosecution that may result from such seizure, the undervaluation as shown by the appraisal shall be presumptive evidence of fraud, and the burden of proof shall be on the claimant to rebut the same, and forfeiture shall be adjudged unless he shall rebut such presumption of fraudulent intent by sufficient evidence. The forfeiture provided for in this section shall apply to the whole of the merchandise or the value thereof in the case or package containing the particular article or articles in each invoice which are undervalued: Provided further, That all additional duties, penalties, or forfeitures applicable to merchandise entered by a duly certified invoice shall be alike applicable to merchandise entered by a pro forma invoice or statement in the form of an invoice, and no forfeiture or disability of any kind incurred under the provisions of this section shall be remitted or mitigated by the Secretary of the Treasury. The duty shall not, however, be assessed in any case upon an amount less than the entered value.

"J. That when merchandise entered for customs duty has been consigned for sale by or on account of the manufacturer thereof, to a person, agent, partner, or consignee in the United States, such person, agent, partner, or consignee shall, at the time of the entry of such merchandise, present to the collector of customs at the port where such entry is made, as a part of such entry, and in addition to the certified invoice or statement in the form of an invoice required by law, a statement signed by such manufacturer, declaring the cost of production of such merchandise, such cost to include all the elements of cost as stated in paragraph L of this act. When merchandise entered for customs duty has been consigned for sale by or on account of a person other than the manufacturer of such merchandise, to a person, agent, partner, or consignee in the United States, such person, agent, partner, or consignee shall at the time of the entry of such merchandise present to the collector of customs at the port where such entry is made, as a part of such entry, a statement signed by the consignor thereof, declaring that the merchandise was actually purchased by him or for his account, and showing the time when, the place where, and from whom he purchased the merchandise, and in detail the price he paid for the same: Provided, That the statements required by this section shall be made in triplicate, and shall bear the attestation of the consular officer of the United States resident within the consular district wherein the merchandise was manufactured, if consigned by the manufacturer or for his account, or from whence it was imported when consigned by a person other than the manufacturer, one copy thereof to be delivered to the person making the statement, one copy to be transmitted with the triplicate invoice of the merchandise to the collector of the port in the United States to which the merchandise is consigned, and the remaining copy to be filed in the consulate.

"K. That it shall be the duty of the appraisers of the United States, and every of them, and every person who shall act as such appraiser, or of the collector, as the case may be, by all reasonable ways and means in his or their power to ascertain, estimate, and appraise (any invoice or affidavit thereto or statement of cost, or of cost of production to the contrary notwithstanding) the actual market value and wholesale price of the merchandise at the time of exportation to the United States, in the principal markets of the country whence the same has been imported, and the number of yards, parcels, or quantities, and actual market value or wholesale price of every of them, as the case may require.

"L. That when the actual market value, as defined by law, of any article of imported merchandise, wholly or partly manufactured and subject to an ad valorem duty, or to a duty based in whole or in part on value, can not be ascertained to the satisfaction of the appraising officer, such officer shall use all available means in his power to ascertain the cost of production of such merchandise at the time of exportation to the United States, and at the place of manufacture, such cost of production to include the cost of materials and of fabrication, and all general expenses to be estimated at not less than 10 per cent, covering each and every outlay of whatsoever nature incident to such production, together with the expense of preparing and putting up such merchandise ready for shipment, and an addition of not less than 8 nor more than 50 per cent upon the total cost as thus ascertained; and in no case shall such merchandise be appraised upon original appraisal or reappraisement at less than the total cost of production as thus ascertained. The actual market value or wholesale price, as defined by law, of any imported merchandise which is consigned for sale in the United States, or which is sold for exportation to the United States, and which is not actually sold or freely offered for sale in usual wholesale quantities in the open market of the country of exportation to all purchasers, shall not in any case be appraised at less than the wholesale price at which such or similar imported merchandise is actually sold or freely offered for sale in usual wholesale quantities in the United States in the open market, due allowance by deduction being made for estimated duties thereon, cost of transportation, insurance and other necessary expenses from the place of shipment to the place of delivery, and a commission not exceeding 6 per cent, if any has been paid or contracted to be paid on consigned goods, or a reasonable allowance for general expenses and profits (not to exceed 8 per cent) on purchased goods; and with reference to the appraisement of all imported merchandise, whether purchased or consigned, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and empowered to determine the existence or nonexistence of a foreign market, and such determination shall be binding and conclusive upon all persons and interests.

"M. That the appraiser shall revise and correct the reports of the assistant appraisers as he may judge proper, and the appraiser, or, at ports where there is no appraiser, the person acting as such, shall report to the collector his decision as to the value of the merchandise appraised. At ports where there is no appraiser the certificate of the customs officer to whom is committed the estimating and collection of duties, of the dutiable value of any merchandise required to be appraised, shall be deemed and taken to be the appraisement of such merchandise. If the collector shall deem the appraisement of any imported merchandise too low, he may, within 60 days thereafter, appeal to reappraisement, which shall be made by one of the general appraisers, or if the importer, owner, agent, or consignee of such merchandise shall deem the appraisement thereof too high, and shall have complied with the requirements of law with respect to the entry and appraisement of merchandise, he may within 10 days thereafter appeal for reappraisement by giving notice thereof to the collector in writing. Such appeal shall be deemed to be finally abandoned and waived unless within 2 days from the date of filing thereof the person who filed such notice shall deposit with the collector of customs a fee of $1 with respect to each appraisement objected to. Such fee shall be deposited and accounted for as miscellaneous receipts, and in case the appeal in connection with which such fee was deposited shall be finally sustained, in whole or in part, such fee shall be refunded to the importer, with the duties found to be collected in excess, from the appropriation for the refund to importers of excess of deposits. The decision of the general appraiser in cases of reappraisement shall be final and conclusive as to the dutiable value of such merchandise against all parties interested therein, unless the importer, owner, consignee, or agent of the merchandise shall deem the reappraisement of the merchandise too high, and shall, within 5 days thereafter, give notice to the collector, in writing, of an appeal, or unless the collector shall deem the reappraisement of the merchandise too low, and shall within 10 days thereafter appeal for re-reappraisement; in either case the collector shall transmit the invoice and all the papers appertaining thereto to the board of 9 general appraisers, to be by rule thereof duly assigned for determination. In such cases the general appraiser and boards of general appraisers shall proceed by all reasonable ways and means in their power to ascertain, estimate, and determine the dutiable value of the imported merchandise, and in so doing may exercise both judicial and inquisitorial functions. In such cases hearings may in the discretion of the general appraiser or Board of General Appraisers before whom the case is pending be open and in the presence of the importer or his attorney and any duly authorized representative of the Government, who may in like discretion examine and cross-examine all witnesses produced. The decision of the appraiser, or the person acting as such (in case where no objection is made thereto, either by the collector or by the importer, owner, consignee, or agent), or the single general appraiser in case of no appeal, or of the board of 3 general appraisers, in all reappraisement cases, shall be final and conclusive against all parties and shall not be subject to review in any manner for any cause in any tribunal or court, and the collector or the person acting as such shall ascertain, fix, and liquidate the rate and amount of the duties to be paid on such merchandise, and the dutiable costs and charges thereon, according to law; and no reappraisement or re-reappraisement shall be considered invalid because of the absence of the merchandise or samples thereof before the officer or officers making the same.

"N. That the decision of the collector as to the rate and amount of duties chargeable upon imported merchandise, or upon merchandise on which duty shall have been assessed, including all dutiable costs and charges, and as to all fees and exactions of whatever character (except duties on tonnage), shall be final and conclusive against all persons interested therein, unless the owner, importer, consignee, or agent of such merchandise, or the person paying such fees, charges, and exactions other than duties, shall, within 30 days after but not before such ascertainment and liquidation of duties, as well in cases of merchandise entered in bond as for consumption, or within 15 days after the payment of such fees, charges, and exactions, if dissatisfied with such decision imposing a higher rate of duty, or a greater charge, fee, or exaction, than he shall claim to be legally payable, file a protest or protests in writing with the collector, setting forth therein distinctly and specifically, and in respect to each entry or payment, the reasons for his objections thereto, and if the merchandise is entered for consumption shall pay the full amount of the duties and charges ascertained to be due thereon. Each protest shall be limited to a single article or class of articles, and to a single entry or payment; and issues of classification shall not be joined with other issues in the same protest. Such protest shall be deemed to be finally abandoned and waived unless within 30 days from the date of filing thereof the person who filed such notice or protest shall have deposited with the collector of customs a fee of $1 with respect to each protest. Such fee shall be deposited and accounted for as miscellaneous receipts, and in case the protest in connection with which such fee was deposited shall be finally sustained in whole or in part, such fee shall be refunded to the importer, with the duties found to be collected in excess, from the appropriation for the refund to importers of excess of deposits.

"Upon such payment of duties, protest, and deposit of protest fee, the collector shall transmit the invoice and all the papers and exhibits connected therewith to the board of nine general appraisers, for due assignment and determination as provided by law; such determination shall be final and conclusive upon all persons interested therein, and the record shall be transmitted to the proper collector or person acting as such, who shall liquidate the entry accordingly, except in cases where an appeal shall be filed in the United States Court of Customs Appeals within the time and in the manner provided for by law.

"O. That the general appraisers, or any of them, are hereby authorized to administer oaths, and said general appraisers, the boards of general appraisers, the local appraisers, or the collectors, as the case may be, may cite to appear before them, and examine upon oath any owner, importer, agent, consignee, or other person touching any matter or thing which they, or either of them, may deem material respecting any imported merchandise then under consideration or previously imported, in ascertaining the dutiable value or classification thereof; and they, or either of them, may require the production of any letters, accounts, contracts, or invoices relating to said merchandise, and may require such testimony to be reduced to writing, and when so taken it shall be filed and preserved for use or reference until the final decision of the collector, appraiser, or said board of appraisers shall be made respecting the valuation or classification of said merchandise, as the case may be; and such evidence shall be given consideration in all subsequent proceedings relating to such merchandise.

"P. That if any person so cited to appear shall neglect or refuse to attend, or shall decline to answer, or shall refuse to answer in writing any interrogatories, and subscribe his name to his deposition, or to produce such papers when so required by a general appraiser, or a board of general appraisers, or a local appraiser, or a collector, he shall be liable to a penalty of not less than $20 nor more than $500, to be summarily imposed by the collector or chief officer of customs in the customs collection district where the citation issued; and upon the report of such officer to the district court in the judicial district where such citation issued, the amount of such penalty shall be forthwith entered upon the docket of such court against the person so fined, and such entry shall have the full force and effect of a judgment of said court; and if such person be the owner, importer, or consignee, the appraisement which the Board of General Appraisers or local appraiser, or collector where there is no appraiser, may make of the merchandise shall be final and conclusive; and any person who shall willfully and corruptly swear falsely on an examination before any general appraiser, or Board of General Appraisers, or local appraiser or collector, shall be deemed guilty of perjury; and if he is the owner, importer, or consignee, the merchandise shall be forfeited, or the value thereof may be recovered from him.

"Q. That all decisions of the general appraisers and of the boards of general appraisers respecting values and rates of duty shall be preserved and filed, and shall be open to inspection under proper regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury. All decisions of the general appraisers shall be reported forthwith to the Secretary of the Treasury and to the Board of General Appraisers on duty at the port of New York, and the report to the board shall be accompanied, whenever practicable, by samples of the merchandise in question, and it shall be the duty of the said board, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, to cause an abstract to be made and published of such decisions of the appraisers as they or he may deem important, and of the decisions of each of the general appraisers and boards of general appraisers, which abstract shall contain a general description of the merchandise in question, a statement of the facts upon which the decision is based, and of the value and rate of duty fixed in each case, with reference, whenever practicable, by number or other designation, to samples deposited in the place of samples at New York, and such abstracts shall be issued from time to time, at least once in each week, for the information of customs officers and the public.

"R. That whenever imported merchandise is subject to an ad valorem rate of duty, or to a duty based upon or regulated in any manner by the value thereof, the duty shall be assessed upon the actual market value or wholesale price thereof, at the time of exportation to the United States, in the principal markets of the country from whence exported; that such actual market value shall be held to be the price at which such merchandise is freely offered for sale to all purchasers in said markets, in the usual wholesale quantities, and the price which the seller, shipper, or owner would have received, and was willing to receive, for such merchandise when sold in the ordinary course of trade in the usual wholesale quantities, including the value of all cartons, cases, crates, boxes, sacks, casks, barrels, hogsheads, bottles, jars, demijohns, carboys, and other containers or coverings, whether holding liquids or solids, and all other costs, charges, and expenses incident to placing the merchandise in condition, packed ready for shipment to the United States, and if there be used for covering or holding imported merchandise, whether dutiable or free, any unusual article or form designed for use otherwise than in the bona fide transportation of such merchandise to the United States, additional duty shall be levied and collected upon such material or article at the rate to which the same would be subjected if separately imported. That the words 'value' or 'actual market value,' or 'wholesale price,' whenever used in this act, or in any law relating to the appraisement of imported merchandise, shall be construed to be the actual market value or wholesale price of such, or similar merchandise comparable in value therewith, as defined in this act.

"S. Any merchandise deposited in any public or private bonded warehouse may be withdrawn for consumption within three years from the date of original importation on payment of the duties and charges to which it may be subject by law at the time of such withdrawal: Provided, That nothing herein shall affect or impair existing provisions of law in regard to the disposal of perishable or explosive articles.

"T. That in all suits or informations brought, where any seizure has been made pursuant to any act providing for or regulating the collection of duties on imports or tonnage, if the property is claimed by any person, the burden of proof shall lie upon such claimant, and in all actions or proceedings for the recovery of the value of merchandise imported contrary to any act providing for or regulating the collection of duties on imports or tonnage, the burden of proof shall be upon the defendant: Provided, That probable cause is shown for such prosecution, to be judged of by the court.

"U. That if any person, persons, corporations, or other bodies selling, shipping, consigning, or manufacturing merchandise exported to the United States shall fail or refuse to submit to the inspection of a duly accredited investigating officer of the United States, when so requested to do, any or all of his books, records, or accounts pertaining to the value or classification of such merchandise, then the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, is authorized while such failure or refusal continues to exclude from entry any and all merchandise sold, shipped, consigned, or manufactured by such person, persons, corporations, or other bodies and imported into the United States.

"V. That if any person, persons, corporations, or other bodies engaged in the importation of merchandise into the United States or engaged in dealing with such imported merchandise shall fail or refuse to submit to the inspection of a duly accredited investigating officer of the United States, upon request so to do from the chief officer of customs at the port where such merchandise is entered, any or all of his books, records, or accounts pertaining to the value or classification of any such imported merchandise, then the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, is authorized while such failure or refusal continues, to exclude from entry any and all merchandise consigned or shipped, or intended for delivery, to such person, persons, corporations, or other bodies so failing or refusing.

"W. That there shall be established in each of the consulates of the United States a registry of commissionaires or purchasing agents; that no person shall be permitted to register as such except upon some affirmative showing of his agency by affidavit indicating the scope of such agency, the parties thereto, the duration, the merchandise to which it relates, the terms and conditions of its exercise, and the commissions involved, the truth of each of which affidavits shall be verified by investigation of the consul before registration is permitted; no such registration shall be permitted unless the agency is operative in the open market exclusively and the commissions provided for are the usual and ordinary commissions prevalent in the trade. Each invoice in which an item of commission appears covering merchandise shipped from any consular district where such registry has been established shall have included in the certificate of the consul a statement that the party claiming in the invoice to be the agent of the purchaser appears on the registry of the consulate as such, and in the absence of such certificate no officer shall allow as nondutiable any item of commission appearing on such invoice or claimed on behalf of any importer.

"No consular officer shall certify any invoice unless he is satisfied that the person making oath thereto is the person he represents himself to be and that he is a credible person and that the statements made under such oath are true, and he shall thereupon, by his certificate, state that the person is the person he represents himself to be, is a credible person, and he believes the statements made in his oath to be true. No consular officer shall certify to the truth of the values stated in any invoice.

"X. That where merchandise purchased or manufactured in different consular districts in the same country is assembled for shipment and embraced in a single invoice and consulated at the shipping point, such invoice shall have attached thereto the original bills or invoices or statements in the nature of such, showing the prices actually paid, contracted to be paid, fixed, or determined, and in connection with each such purchase or consignment the invoice shall state all charges and expenses as provided in paragraph R of this act.

"Y. No allowance shall be made in the estimation and liquidation of duties for shortage or nonimportation caused by decay, destruction, or injury to fruit or other perishable articles imported into the United States whereby their commercial value has been destroyed, unless under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury. Proof to ascertain such destruction or nonimportation shall be lodged with the collector of customs of the port where such merchandise has been landed, or the person acting as such, within 10 days after the landing of such merchandise. The provisions hereof shall apply whether or not the merchandise has been entered, and whether or not the duties have been paid or secured to be paid, and whether or not a permit of delivery has been granted to the owner or consignee. Nor shall any allowance be made for damage, but the importers may within 10 days after entry abandon to the United States all or any portion of goods, wares, or merchandise of every description included in any invoice and be relieved from the payment of duties on the portion so abandoned: Provided, That the portion so abandoned shall amount to 10 per cent or more of the total value or quantity of the invoice. The right of abandonment herein provided for may be exercised whether the goods, wares, or merchandise have been damaged or not, or whether or not the same have any commercial value: Provided further, That section 2899 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the return of packages unopened for appraisement, shall in no wise prohibit the right of importers to make all needful examinations to determine whether the right to abandon accrues, or whether by reason of total destruction there is a nonimportation in whole or in part. All merchandise abandoned to the Government by the importers shall be delivered by the importers thereof at such place within the port of arrival as the chief officer of customs may direct, and on the failure of the importers to comply with the direction of the collector or the chief officer of customs, as the case may be, the abandoned merchandise shall be disposed of by the customs authorities under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, at the expense of such importers. Where imported fruit or perishable goods have been condemned at the port of original entry within 10 days after landing, by health officers or other legally constituted authorities, the importers or their agents shall, within 24 hours after such condemnation, lodge with the collector, or the person acting as collector, of said port, notice thereof in writing, together with an invoice description and the quantity of the articles condemned, their location, and the name of the vessel in which imported. Upon receipt of said notice the collector, or person acting as collector, shall at once cause an investigation and a report to be made in writing by at least two customs officers touching the identity and quantity of fruit or perishable goods condemned, and unless proof to ascertain the shortage or nonimportation of fruit or perishable goods shall have been lodged as herein required, or if the importer or his agent fails to notify the collector of such condemnation proceedings as herein provided, proof of such shortage or nonimportation shall not be deemed established and no allowance shall be made in the liquidation of duties chargeable thereon.

"Z. That whenever it shall be shown to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury that, in any case of unascertained or estimated duties, or payments made upon appeal, more money has been paid to or deposited with a collector of customs than, as has been ascertained by final liquidation thereof, the law required to be paid or deposited, the Secretary of the Treasury shall direct the Treasurer to refund and pay the same out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. The necessary moneys therefor are hereby appropriated, and this appropriation shall be deemed a permanent indefinite appropriation; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to correct manifest clerical errors in any entry or liquidation for or against the United States, at any time within one year of the date of such entry, but not afterwards: Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall, in his annual report to Congress, give a detailed statement of the various sums of money refunded under the provisions of this act or of any other act of Congress relating to the revenue, together with copies of the rulings under which repayments were made.

"AA. That from and after the taking effect of this act, no collector or other officer of the customs shall be in any way liable to any owner, importer, consignee, or agent of any merchandise, or any other person, for or on account of any rulings or decisions as to the classification of said merchandise or the duties charged thereon, or the collection of any dues, charges, or duties on or on account of said merchandise, or any other matter or thing as to which said owner, importer, consignee, or agent of such merchandise might, under this act, be entitled to appeal from the decision of said collector or other officer, or from any board of appraisers.

"BB. That any person who shall give, or offer to give, or promise to give, any money or thing of value, directly or indirectly, to any officer or employee of the United States in consideration of or for any act or omission contrary to law in connection with or pertaining to the importation, appraisement, entry, examination, or inspection of goods, wares, or merchandise, including herein any baggage or of the liquidation of the entry thereof, or shall by threats or demands or promises of any character attempt to improperly influence or control any such officer or employee of the United States as to the performance of his official duties shall, on conviction thereof, be fined not exceeding $2,000, or be imprisoned at hard labor not more than one year, or both, in the discretion of the court; and evidence of such giving, or offering, or promising to give, satisfactory to the court in which such trial is had, shall be regarded as prima facie evidence that such giving or offering or promising was contrary to law, and shall put upon the accused the burden of proving that such act was innocent and not done with an unlawful intention.

"CC. That any officer or employee of the United States who shall, excepting for lawful duties or fees, solicit, demand, exact, or receive from any person, directly or indirectly, any money or thing of value in connection with or pertaining to the importation, appraisement, entry, examination, or inspection of goods, wares, or merchandise, including herein any baggage or liquidation of the entry thereof, on conviction thereof shall be fined not exceeding $5,000, or be imprisoned at hard labor not more than two years, or both, in the discretion of the court; and evidence of such soliciting, demanding, exacting, or receiving, satisfactory to the court in which such trial is had, shall be regarded as prima facie evidence that such soliciting, demanding, exacting, or receiving was contrary to law, and shall put upon the accused the burden of proving that such act was innocent and not with an unlawful intention.

"DD. That any baggage or personal effects arriving in the United States in transit to any foreign country may be delivered by the parties having it in charge to the collector of the proper district, to be by him retained, without the payment or exaction of any import duty, or to be forwarded by such collector to the collector of the port of departure and to be delivered to such parties on their departure for their foreign destination, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe."

SECTION IV.

A. That for the purpose of readjusting the present duties on importations into the United States and at the same time to encourage the export trade of this country, the President of the United States is authorized and empowered to negotiate trade agreements with foreign nations wherein mutual concessions are made looking toward freer trade relations and further reciprocal expansion of trade and commerce: Provided, however, That said trade agreements before becoming operative shall be submitted to the Congress of the United States for ratification or rejection.

B. That nothing in this act contained shall be so construed as to abrogate or in any manner impair or affect the provisions of the treaty of commercial reciprocity concluded between the United States and the Republic of Cuba on the 11th day of December, 1902, or the provisions of the act of Congress heretofore passed for the execution of the same.

C. That there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon all articles coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands the rates of duty which are required to be levied, collected, and paid upon like articles imported from foreign countries: Provided, That all articles, the growth or product of or manufactured in the Philippine Islands from materials the growth or product of the Philippine Islands or of the United States, or of both, or which do not contain foreign materials to the value of more than 50 per cent of their total value, or 20 per cent in case of manufactures of tobacco, upon which no drawback of customs duties has been allowed therein, coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands shall hereafter be admitted free of duty: Provided, however, That in consideration of the exemptions aforesaid, all articles, the growth, product, or manufacture of the United States, upon which no drawback of customs duties has been allowed therein, shall be admitted to the Philippine Islands from the United States free of duty: And provided further, That the free admission, herein provided, of such articles, the growth, product, or manufacture of the United States, into the Philippine Islands, or of the growth, product, or manufacture, as hereinbefore defined, of the Philippine Islands into the United States, shall be conditioned upon the direct shipment thereof, under a through bill of lading, from the country of origin to the country of destination: Provided, That direct shipment shall include shipments in bond through foreign territory contiguous to the United States: Provided, however, That if such articles become unpacked while en route by accident, wreck, or other casualty, or so damages as to necessitate their repacking, the same shall be admitted free of duty upon satisfactory proof that the unpacking occurred through accident or necessity and that the merchandise involved is the identical merchandise originally shipped from the United States or the Philippine Islands, as the case may be, and that its condition has not been changed except for such damage as may have been sustained: And provided, That there shall be levied, collected, and paid, in the United States, upon articles, goods, wares, or merchandise coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands, a tax equal to the internal-revenue tax imposed in the United States upon the like articles, goods, wares, or merchandise of domestic manufacture; such tax to be paid by internal-revenue stamp or stamps, to be provided by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and to be affixed in such manner and under such regulations as he, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe; and such articles, goods, wares, or merchandise, shipped from said islands to the United States, shall be exempt from the payment of any tax imposed by the internal-revenue laws of the Philippine Islands: And provided further, That there shall be levied, collected, and paid in the Philippine Islands, upon articles, goods, wares, or merchandise going into the Philippine Islands from the United States, a tax equal to the internal-revenue tax imposed in the Philippine Islands upon the like articles, goods, wares, or merchandise of Philippine Islands manufacture; such tax to be paid by internal-revenue stamps or otherwise, as provided by the laws in the Philippine Islands; and such articles, goods, wares, or merchandise going into the Philippine Islands from the United States shall be exempt from the payment of any tax imposed by the internal-revenue laws of the United States: And provided further, That in addition to the customs taxes imposed in the Philippine Islands, there shall be levied, collected, and paid therein upon articles, goods, wares, or merchandise imported into the Philippine Islands from countries other than the United States, the internal-revenue tax imposed by the Philippine Government on like articles manufactured and consumed in the Philippine Islands or shipped thereto for consumption therein, from the United States: And provided further, That from and after the passage of this act all internal revenues collected in or for account of the Philippine Islands shall accrue intact to the general government thereof and be paid into the insular treasury: And provided further, That section 13 of "An act to raise revenue for the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909, is hereby repealed.

D. That articles, goods, wares, or merchandise going into Porto Rico from the United States shall be exempted from the payment of any tax imposed by the internal-revenue laws of the United States.

E. That whenever any country, dependency, colony, province, or other political subdivision of government shall pay or bestow, directly or indirectly, any bounty or grant upon the exportation of any article or merchandise from such country, dependency, colony, province, or other political subdivision of government, and such article or merchandise is dutiable under the provisions of this act, then upon the importation of any such article or merchandise into the United States, whether the same shall be imported directly from the country of production or otherwise, and whether such article or merchandise is imported in the same condition as when exported from the country of production or has been changed in condition by manufacture or otherwise, there shall be levied, and paid, in all such cases, in addition to the duties otherwise imposed by this act, an additional duty equal to the net amount of such bounty or grant, however the same be paid or bestowed. The net amount of all such bounties or grants shall be from time to time ascertained, determined, and declared by the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall make all needful regulations for the indentification of such articles and merchandise and for the assessment and collection of such additional duties.

F. Subsection 1. That all articles of foreign manufacture or production, which are capable of being marked, stamped, branded, or labeled, without injury, shall be marked, stamped, branded or labeled in legible English words, in a conspicious place that shall not be covered or obscured by any subsequent attachments or arrangements so as to indicate the country of origin. Said marking, stamping, branding, or labeling shall be as nearly indelible and permanent as the nature of the article will permit.

All packages containing imported articles shall be marked, stamped, branded, or labeled so as to indicate legibly and plainly, in English words, the country of origin and the quantity of their contents, and until marked in accordance with the directions prescribed in this section no articles or packages shall be delivered to the importer.

Should any article or package of imported merchandise be marked, stamped, branded, or labeled so as not accurately to indicate the quantity, number, or measurement actually contained in such article or package, no delivery of the same shall be made to the importer until the mark, stamp, brand, or label, as the case may be, shall be changed so as to conform to the facts of the case.

The Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe the necessary rules and regulations to carry out the foregoing provision.

F. Subsection 2. If any person shall fraudulently violate any of the provisions of this act relating to the marking, stamping, branding, or labeling of any imported articles or packages; or shall fraudulently deface, destroy, remove, alter, or obliterate any such marks, stamps, brands, or labels with intent to conceal the information given by or contained in such marks, stamps, brands, or labels, he shall upon conviction be fined in any sum not exceeding $5,000, or be imprisoned for any time not exceeding one year, or both.

G. Subsection 1. That all persons are prohibited from importing into the United States from any foreign country any obscene book, pamphlet, paper, writing, advertisement, circular, print, picture, drawing, or other representation, figure, or image on or of paper or other material, or any cast, instrument, or other article of an immoral nature, or any drug or medicine, or any article whatever for the prevention of conception or for causing unlawful abortion, or any lottery ticket, or any advertisement of any lottery. No such articles, whether imported separately or contained in packages with other goods entitled to entry, shall be admitted to entry; and all such articles shall be proceeded against, seized, and forfeited by due course of law. All such prohibited articles and the package in which they are contained in the course of importation shall be detained by the officer of customs, and proceedings taken against the same as hereinafter prescribed, unless it appears to the satisfaction of the collector of customs that the obscene articles contained in the package were inclosed therein without the knowledge or consent of the importer, owner, agent, or consignee: Provided, That the drugs hereinbefore mentioned, when imported in bulk and not put up for any of the purposes hereinbefore specified, are excepted from the operation of this subsection.

G. Subsection 2. That whoever, being an officer, agent, or employee of the Government of the United States, shall knowingly aid or abet any person engaged in any violation of any of the provisions of law prohibiting importing, advertising, dealing in, exhibiting, or sending or receiving by mail obscene or indecent publications or representations, or means for preventing conception or procuring abortion, or other articles of indecent or immoral use or tendency, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall for every offense be punishable by a fine of not more than $5,000, or by imprisonment at hard labor for not more than 10 years, or both.

G. Subsection 3. That any circuit or district judge of the United States, within the proper district, before whom complaint in writing of any violation of the two preceding sections is made, to the satisfaction of such judge, and founded on knowledge or belief, and if upon belief, setting forth the grounds of such belief, and supported by oath or affirmation of the complainant, may issue, conformably to the Constitution, a warrant directed to the marshal or any deputy marshal in the proper district, directing him to search for, seize, and take possession of any such article or thing mentioned in the two preceding sections, and to make due and immediate return thereof, to the end that the same may be condemned and destroyed by proceedings, which shall be conducted in the same manner as other proceedings in the case of municipal seizure, and with the same right of appeal or writ of error.

H. Subsection 1. That the importation of neat cattle and the hides of neat cattle from any foreign country into the United States is prohibited: Provided, That the operation of this section shall be suspended as to any foreign country or countries, or any parts of such country or countries, whenever the Secretary of the Treasury shall officially determine, and give public notice thereof, that such importation will not tend to the introduction or spread of contagious or infectious diseases among the cattle of the United States; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and empowered, and it shall be his duty, to make all necessary orders and regulations to carry this section into effect, or to suspend the same as herein provided, and to send copies thereof to the proper officers in the United States and to such officers or agents of the United States in foreign countries as he shall judge necessary.

H. Subsection 2. That any person convicted of a willful violation of any of the provisions of the preceding section shall be fined not exceeding $500, or imprisoned not exceeding one year, or both, in the discretion of the court.

I. That all goods, wares, articles, and merchandise manufactured wholly or in part in any foreign country by convict labor shall not be entitled to entry at any of the ports of the United States, and the importation thereof is hereby prohibited, and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to prescribe such regulations as may be necessary for the enforcement of this provision.

J. Subsection 1. That a discriminating duty of 10 per cent ad valorem, in addition to the duties imposed by law, shall be levied, collected, and paid on all goods, wares, or merchandise which shall be imported in vessels not of the United States, or which being the production or manufacture of any foreign country not contiguous to the United States, shall come into the United States from such contiguous country; but this discriminating duty shall not apply to goods, wares, or merchandise which shall be imported in vessels not of the United States entitled at the time of such importation by treaty or convention or act of Congress to be entered in the ports of the United States on payment of the same duties as shall then be payable on goods, wares, and merchandise imported in vessels of the United States, nor to such foreign products or manufactures as shall be imported from such contiguous countries in the usual course of strictly retail trade.

J. Subsection 2. That no goods, wares, or merchandise, unless in cases provided for by treaty, shall be imported into the United States from any foreign port or place, except in vessels of the United States, or in such foreign vessels as truly and wholly belong to the citizens or subjects of that country of which the goods are the growth, production, or manufacture, or from which such goods, wares, or merchandise can only be, or most usually are, first shipped for transportation. All goods, wares, or merchandise imported contrary to this section, and the vessel wherein the same shall be imported, together with her cargo, tackle, apparel, and furniture, shall be forfeited to the United States; and such goods, wares, or merchandise, ship, or vessel, and cargo shall be liable to be seized, prosecuted, and condemned in like manner, and under the same regulations, restrictions, and provisions as have been heretofore established for the recovery, collection, distribution, and remission of forfeitures to the United States by the several revenue laws.

J. Subsection 3. That the preceding subsection shall not apply to vessels or goods, wares, or merchandise imported in vessels of a foreign nation which does not maintain a similar regulation against vessels of the United States.

J. Subsection 4. That machinery or other articles to be altered or repaired, molders' patterns for use in the manufacture of castings intended to be and actually exported within six months from the date of importation thereof, commercial travelers' samples solely for use in taking orders for merchandise, articles intended solely for experimental purposes, and automobiles, motor cycles, bicycles, aeroplanes, airships, balloons, motor boats, racing shells, teams, and saddle horses, and similar vehicles and craft brought temporarily into the United States by nonresidents for touring purposes or for the purpose of taking part in races or other specific contests, may be admited without the payment of duty under bond for their exportation within six months from the date of importation and under such regulations and subject to such conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe: Provided, That no article shall be entitled to entry under this section that is intended for sale or which is imported for sale on approval.

J. Subsection 5. That all materials of foreign production which may be necessary for the construction of vessels built in the United States for foreign account and ownership, or for the purpose of being employed in the foreign or domestic trade, and all such materials necessary for the building of their machinery, and all articles necessary for their outfit and equipment, may be imported in bond under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; and upon proof that such materials have been used for such purposes no duties shall be paid thereon.

J. Subsection 6. That all articles of foreign production needed for the repair of American vessels may be withdrawn from bonded warehouses free of duty, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

J. Subsection 7. That a discount of 5 per cent on all duties imposed by this act shall be allowed on such goods, wares, and merchandise as shall be imported in vessels admitted to registration under the laws of the United States.

K. The privilege of purchasing supplies from public warehouses, free of duty, and from bonded manufacturing warehouses, free of duty or of internal-revenue tax, as the case may be, shall be extended, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe, to the vessels of war of any nation in ports of the United States which may reciprocate such privileges toward the vessels of war of the United States in its ports.

L. That whenever any vessel laden with merchandise, in whole or in part subject to duty, has been sunk in any river, harbor, bay, or waters subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, and within its limits, for the period of two years, and is abandoned by the owner thereof, any person who may raise such vessel shall be permitted to bring any merchandise recovered therefrom into the port nearest to the place where such vessel was so raised free from the payment of any duty thereupon, but under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

M. That all articles manufactured in whole or in part of imported materials, or of materials subject to internal-revenue tax, and intended for exportation without being charged with duty, and without having an internal-revenue stamp affixed thereto, shall, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, in order to be so manufactured and exported, be made and manufactured in bonded warehouses similar to those known and designated in Treasury Regulations as bonded warehouses, class 6: Provided, That the manufacturer of such articles shall first give satisfactory bonds for the faithful observance of all the provisions of law and of such regulations as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided further, That the manufacture of distilled spirits from grain, starch, molasses, or sugar, including all dilutions or mixtures of them or either of them, shall not be permitted in such manufacturing warehouses.

Whenever goods manufactured in any bonded warehouse established under the provisions of the preceding paragraph shall be exported directly therefrom or shall be duly laden for transportation and immediate exportation under the supervision of the proper officer who shall be duly designated for that purpose, such goods shall be exempt from duty and from the requirements relating to revenue stamps.

Any materials used in the manufacture of such goods, and any packages, coverings, vessels, brands, and labels used in putting up the same may, under the regulations of the Secretary of the Treasury, be conveyed without the payment of revenue tax or duty into any bonded manufacturing warehouse, and imported goods may, under the aforesaid regulations, be transferred without the exaction of duty from any bonded warehouse into any bonded manufacturing warehouse; but this privilege shall not be held to apply to implements, machinery, or apparatus to be used in the construction or repair of any bonded manufacturing warehouse or for the prosecution of the business carried on therein.

No articles or materials received into such bonded manufacturing warehouse shall be withdrawn or removed therefrom except for direct shipment and exportation or for transportation and immediate exportation in bond to foreign countries or to the Philippine Islands under the supervision of the officer duly designated therefor by the collector of the port, who shall certify to such shipment and exportation, or ladening for transportation, as the case may be, describing the articles by their mark or otherwise, the quantity, the date of exportation, and the name of the vessel: Provided, That the waste material or by-products incidents to the processes of manufacture in said bonded warehouses may be withdrawn for domestic consumption on the payment of duty equal to the duty which would be assessed and collected, by law, if such waste or by-products were imported from a foreign country. All labor performed and services rendered under these provisions shall be under the supervision of a duly designated officer of the customs and at the expense of the manufacturer.

A careful account shall be kept by the collector of all merchandise delivered by him to any bonded manufacturing warehouse, and a sworn monthly return, verified by the customs officers in charge, shall be made by the manufacturers containing a detailed statement of all imported merchandise used by him in the manufacture of exported articles.

Before commencing business the proprietor of any manufacturing warehouse shall file with the Secretary of the Treasury a list of all the articles intended to be manufactured in such warehouse, and state the formula of manufacture and the names and quantities of the ingredients to be used therein.

Articles manufactured under these provisions may be withdrawn under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe for transportation and delivery into any bonded warehouse at an exterior port for the sole purpose of immediate export therefrom.

The provisions of Revised Statutes 3433 shall, so far as may be practicable, apply to any bonded manufacturing warehouse established under this act and to the merchandise conveyed therein.

N. That the works of manufacturers engaged in smelting or refining, or both, of ores and crude metals, may upon the giving of satisfactory bonds be designated as bonded smelting warehouses. Ores or crude metals may be removed from the vessel or other vehicle in which imported, or from a bonded warehouse, into a bonded smelting warehouse without the payment of duties thereon and there smelted or refined, or both, together with other ores or crude metals of home or foreign production: Provided, That the several charges against such bonds may be canceled upon the exportation or delivery to a bonded manufacturing warehouse, established under section M of this section, of the actual amount of metal produced from the smelting or refining, or both, of such ores or crude metals: And provided further, That said metal may be withdrawn for domestic consumption or transferred to a bonded customs warehouse and withdrawn therefrom upon the payment of the duties chargeable against it in that condition: Provided further, That all labor performed and services rendered pursuant to this section shall be under the supervision of an officer of the customs, to be appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and at the expense of the manufacturer: Provided further, That all regulations for the carrying out of this section shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

O. That upon the exportation of articles manufactured or produced in the United States by the use of imported merchandise or materials upon which customs duties have been paid, the full amount of such duties paid upon the quantity of materials used in the manufacture or production of the exported product shall be refunded as drawback, less 1 per cent of such duties: Provided, That where a principal product and a by-product result from the manipulation of imported material and only the by-product is exported, the proportion of the drawback distributed to such by-product shall not exceed the duty assessable under this act on a similar by-product of foreign origin if imported into the United States. Where no duty is assessable upon the importation of a corresponding by-product, no drawback shall be payable on such by-product produced from the imported material; if, however, the principal product is exported, then on the exportation thereof there shall be refunded as drawback the whole of the duty paid on the imported material used in the production of both the principal and the by-product, less 1 per cent, as hereinbefore provided: Provided further, That when the articles exported are manufactured in part from domestic materials, the imported materials or the parts of the articles manufactured from such materials, shall so appear in the completed articles that the quantity or measure thereof may be ascertained: And provided further, That the drawback on any article allowed under existing law shall be continued at the rate herein provided. That the imported materials used in the manufacture or production of articles entitled to drawback of customs duties when exported shall, in all cases where drawback of duties paid on such materials is claimed, be identified, the quantity of such materials used and the amount of duties paid thereon shall be ascertained, the facts of the manufacture or production of such articles in the United States and their exportation therefrom shall be determined, and the drawback due thereon shall be paid to the manufacturer, producer, or exporter, to the agent of either or to the person to whom such manufacturer, producer, exporter, or agent shall in writing order such drawback paid, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe

That on the exportation of flavoring extracts, medicinal or toilet preparations (including perfumery) hereafter manufactured or produced in the United States in part from domestic alcohol on which an internal-revenue tax has been paid, there shall be allowed a drawback equal in amount to the tax found to have been paid on the alcohol so used: Provided, That no other than domestic tax-paid alcohol shall have been used in the manufacture or production of such preparations. Such drawback shall be determined and paid under such rules and regulations, and upon the filing of such notices, bonds, bills of lading, and other evidence of payment of tax and exportation, as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe.

That the provisions of this section shall apply to materials used in the construction and equipment of vessels built for foreign account and ownership, or for the government of any foreign country, notwithstanding that such vessels may not within the strict meaning of the term be articles exported.

P. That upon the reimportation of articles once exported, of the growth, product, or manufacture of the United States, upon which no internal tax has been assessed or paid, or upon which such tax has been paid and refunded by allowance or drawback, there shall be levied, collected, and paid a duty equal to the tax imposed by the internal-revenue laws upon such articles, except articles manufactured in bonded warehouses and exported pursuant to law, which shall be subject to the same rate of duty as if originally imported, but proof of the identify of such articles shall be made under general regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Q. That on and after the day when this act shall go into effect all goods, wares, and merchandise previously imported, for which no entry has been made, and all goods, wares, and merchandise previously entered without payment of duty and under bond for warehousing, transportation, or any other purpose, for which no permit of delivery to the importer or his agent has been issued, shall be subjected to the duties imposed by this act and to no other duty, upon the entry or the withdrawal thereof: Provided, That when duties are based upon the weight of merchandise deposited in any public or private bonded warehouse, said duties shall be levied and collected upon the weight of such merchandise at the time of its entry.

R. That whenever articles are exported to the United States of a class or kind made or produced in the United States, if the export or actual selling price to an importer in the United States, or the price at which such goods are consigned is less than the fair market value of the same article when sold for home consumption in the usual and ordinary course in the country whence exported to the United States at the time of its exportation to the United States, there shall, in addition to the duties otherwise established, be levied, collected, and paid on such article on its importation into the United States a special duty (or dumping duty) equal to the difference between the said export or actual selling price of the article for export or the price at which such goods are consigned, and the said fair market value thereof for home consumption, provided that the said special duty shall not exceed 15 per cent ad valorem in any case and that goods whereon the duties otherwise established are equal to 50 per cent ad valorem shall be exempt from such special duty.

"Export price" or "selling price" or "price at which such goods are consigned" in this section shall be held to mean and include the exporter's price for the goods, exclusive of all charges thereon after their shipment from the place whence exported directly to the United States.

The Secretary of the Treasury shall make such rules and regulations as are necessary for the carrying out of the provisions of this section and for the enforcement thereof.

S. That the President shall cause to be ascertained each year the amount of imports and exports of the articles enumerated in the various paragraphs in section 1 of this act and cause an estimate to be made of the amount of the domestic production and consumption of said articles, and where it is ascertained that the imports under any paragraph amount to less than 5 per cent of the domestic consumption of the articles enumerated he shall advise the Congress as to the facts and his conclusions by special message.

T. That, except as hereinafter provided, sections 1 to 42, both inclusive, of an act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909, and all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act, are hereby repealed: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to repeal or in any manner affect the following numbered sections of the aforesaid act approved August 5, 1909, viz: Subsection 29 of section 28 and subsequent provisions relating to the establishment and continuance of a customs court; subsection 30 of section 28, providing for additional attorneys; subsection 12 of section 28 and subsequent provisions, establishing a Board of General Appraisers of merchandise; sections 30, 31, 32, 33, and 35, imposing an internal-revenue tax upon tobacco; section 36, providing for a tonnage duty; section 39, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to borrow on the credit of the United States to defray expenditures on account of the Panama Canal; section 40, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to borrow to meet public expenditures: Provided further, That all excise taxes upon corporations imposed by section 38 that have accrued or have been imposed for the year ending December 31, 1912 shall be returned, assessed, and collected in the same manner and under the same provisions, liens, and penalties as if section 38 continued in full force and effect; but the repeal of existing laws or modifications thereof embraced in this act shall not affect any act done, or any right accruing or accrued, or any suit or proceeding had or commenced in any civil case before the said repeal or modification; but all rights and liabilities under said laws shall continue and may be enforced in the same manner as if said repeal or modifications had not been made. Any offenses committed and all penalties or forfeitures or liabilities incurred prior to the passage of this act under any statute embraced in or changed, modified, or repealed by this act may be prosecuted or punished in the same manner and with the same effect as if this act had not been passed. All acts of limitation, whether applicable to civil causes and proceedings or to the prosecution of offenses or for the recovery of penalties or forfeitures embraced in or modified, changed, or repealed by this act, shall not be affected thereby; and all suits, proceedings, or prosecutions, whether civil or criminal, for causes arising or acts done or committed prior to the passage of this act, may be commenced and prosecuted within the same time and with the same effect as if this act had not been passed.

U. That unless otherwise herein specially provided, this act shall take effect on the day following its passage.

Mr. SIMMONS. I now ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I have sent to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution submitted by the Senator from North Carolina.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That 5,000 copies of H. R. 3321, "An act to reduce tariff duties and to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," be printed for the use of the Senate folding room.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I simply want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that, if that resolution be passed, it will be sent back by the Public Printer, because it will cost more than $500 to print that number of copies of the bill. I know that 2,175 copies of the tariff bill cost $500 to print, because they have been printed for the other House. If the resolution is passed, the Printing Office will not be able to print the number of copies suggested, as the work would cost more than $500.

Mr. SIMMONS. In the light of the information given by the Senator from Utah, I will change the resolution so as to read "2,000 copies."

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator can make the number 2,150, if he desires, but 2,000 will be all right.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will make the number 2,000.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be so modified. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as modified.

The resolution as modified was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi still has the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I now move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. The Chair made the announcement that the Senator from Mississippi "still has the floor." There would have been no possible objection to the announcement of the Chair that the Senator from Mississippi had the floor, but I protest against any Senator taking the floor and doling it out to other Senators. There is no rule under which that can be done. It is a practice that can be abused, and it is one that has been repudiated by the Senate. On this particular occasion I shall not press the matter, but I do intend to insist that that shall not happen any more. A Senator has no such right.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that the Senator from Arkansas is right.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In this particular case I obtained the floor to move an adjournment, and yielded to the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS].

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. A Senator has no right to farm out the time under our code of rules here.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I merely yielded.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will announce, for the benefit of the Senator from Arkansas, that he has been informed by those who know that the statement of the Senator from Arkansas is correct, and that no Senator can farm out the floor.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Of course that is right.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I was not farming out the floor. I simply yielded to an interruption.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The Senator had no right to yield, and when he yielded he went off the floor. He had no right to dole it out to anybody.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I now move that the Senate adjourn.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. NORRIS. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. The motion is not debatable.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska will state his parliamentary inquiry.

VALORIZATION OF COFFEE.

Mr. NORRIS. At the last session of the Senate I announced that immediately upon the close of the morning business to-day I desired to address the Senate upon the reply of the Attorney General to Senate resolution 58. I will say I have not been permitted to do that because other matters have intervened. In case I desire, as I do, at the conclusion of the morning business or the unfinished business at the next session, to address myself to that subject, is it necessary to make that announcement again now?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, I desire to give that notice now.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I ask for the regular order.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. A motion to adjourn has been made, and that motion is not debatable.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Mississippi that the Senate adjourn. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it, and the motion is lost.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask for a division.

The Senate refused to adjourn, there being, on a division—ayes 5, noes 45.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. BACON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Was the presence of a quorum disclosed?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair takes the figures as given to him by the Secretary. The Chair refuses to act as a counting official.

Mr. BACON. I call for the regular order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I mean, was the presence of a quorum disclosed on the figures given by the Secretary?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty Senators responded to the call for a division.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That was all of my parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 14 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 56 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Tuesday, May 13, 1913, at 2 o'clock p. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, May 9, 1913.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

For all the tokens of Thy care, O God our Father, which come to us in sunshine and shadow, joy and sorrow, hope and disappointment, faith and doubt, victory and defeat, we thank Thee, and most earnestly pray that they may have their perfect work, fitting us for the now and the then, the here and the there, in the great fields of endeavor which wait on us; that we may grow day by day into the likeness of our Maker after the similitude of the Master. Amen.

THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the Journal will be considered as approved.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to call attention to what I think is an error in the Journal. The recital is that I offered a motion to recommit, and then the next recital is that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] offered a substitute, and next that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] raised the point of order against my original motion, and that after discussion the point of order was sustained. Then the Journal does not show that I offered another motion to recommit, which was finally received and acted upon by the House without any point of order. That is omitted entirely, and the recital is that the vote was taken on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Kansas, and then that the vote was taken on my original motion. In other words, reference to my motion to recommit, on which the vote was taken, is entirely omitted from the Journal.

The second motion to recommit not having been read in the House, the text of that motion was omitted from the RECORD, although the RECORD correctly recites the fact that my second motion to recommit was made. I think the error in the Journal occurs in that way.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman states the matter correctly. The way it occurred was this: The gentleman from New York first offered a motion to recommit, which the Chair ruled out of order. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] never did offer any substitute or amendment to that motion. After that motion of the gentleman from New York was disposed of by the vote taken on the appeal, and so forth, then the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] offered a second motion to recommit with instructions, the instructions being identical with those in the motion which was ruled out of order, except that the second motion left out the proposition about the tariff commission or board, whichever it is. When the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] offered that second motion to recommit the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] offered his substitute, and the vote was taken on the motion of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK]. He demanded a division, and there was a division. Then he demanded the yeas and nays, but did not muster enough Members to get the yeas and nays. Then the vote was taken on the second motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

Mr. MANN. I suggest that the Journal ought to show in full the two motions offered by the gentleman from New York.

The SPEAKER. Of course.

Mr. MURDOCK. The RECORD does not show the text of the two motions to recommit.

Mr. PAYNE. It does not print in full the second motion that I made. It states that I made the motion.

The SPEAKER. Of course, that part of the Journal is made up from the RECORD, and if the RECORD did not contain it the Journal would not contain it. For the benefit of those who come after us, both the Journal and RECORD should be corrected in that respect. It ought to be set out in full as it actually was, and both corrections will be made.

SWEARING IN OF A MEMBER.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Representative Elect RICHARD S. WHALEY, from the first district of South Carolina, is present, and his credentials are on file. I wish to present him to take the oath of office.

The SPEAKER. Where are the credentials?

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I understand his credentials have been sent to the Clerk of the House.

Mr. MANN. The credentials not being at the desk, let me ask the gentleman from South Carolina, is there any contest?

Mr. FINLEY. None at all; not a vote against him.

Mr. MANN. I do not object to his being sworn in.

Mr. WHALEY appeared at the bar of the House and took the oath of office.

CHARLES C. GLOVER.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia offers a privileged resolution, which will be read by the Clerk.

House resolution 99.

Resolved, That the Speaker do issue his warrant directed to the Sergeant at Arms commanding him to take in custody wherever to be found the body of Charles C. Glover, of the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, and the same in custody to keep, and that the said Charles C. Glover be forthwith brought to the bar of the House of Representatives on this the 9th day of May, 1913, to answer the charge that he, on Friday, April 18, 1913, in the city of Washington, D. C., committed an assault upon the person of Representative THETUS W. SIMS, a Representative in the Sixty-third Congress from the State of Tennessee, because of words spoken by the said Representative SIMS in debate on the floor of the House of Representatives while the House was in regular session during the Sixty-second Congress, and that in committing said assault Charles C. Glover has been guilty of a breach of the privileges and a contempt of the House of Representatives; and that the said Charles C. Glover be furnished with a copy of this resolution and a copy of the report of the select committee of the House of Representatives appointed to investigate the charge made against him in the House of Representatives.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, before proceeding to discuss the resolution I should be glad if we could agree on some time for debate. I would like to inquire if it is anticipated that the resolution will be opposed?

Mr. MANN. I understand, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] desires for himself one hour in opposition to the resolution. Whether there are other gentlemen who desire to be heard upon it on this side of the House at present I am not informed.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. I will ask the gentleman from Kansas if he is advised that there are others in sympathy with him who desire to speak?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I am not advised as to whether anyone else will participate in the discussion against the adoption of the resolution or not. I have not talked with anyone who has expressed an intention of doing so, although many Members have stated that they might get into the discussion if an opportunity was offered.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. How much time does the gentleman from Kansas desire?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I should like the privilege of an hour. Whether I shall occupy all the time or not I do not know.

Mr. MANN. How much time does the gentleman from West Virginia think will be required by those in favor of the resolution?

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. I am advised, Mr. Speaker, that probably three hours will be consumed by those who desire to speak in favor of the resolution.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Then I would suggest that the matter be left open as to those who oppose the resolution. I think the House will take notice of the fact that the membership has been very busy within the last two weeks, since this matter came up, and little opportunity has been offered to inquire into the case involved in this unusual proceeding, and it may be that Members, after hearing the discussion, will feel justified in taking part in it in opposition to it.

Mr. MANN. I will suggest to the gentleman from West Virginia that if we should have two hours and a quarter or two hours and a half on each side, that that would probably cover the time.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. I am satisfied that that would be enough. In view of the limited evidence of any intention to oppose the resolution, I think we can hardly make an even division of the time. I do not want to be unfair about it.

Mr. MANN. There are several gentlemen on the other side who have indicated that they may desire time in opposition to the resolution, and I believe there are several gentlemen on the other side who desire to be heard in favor of the resolution. I suggest two hours and a half on each side of the House, and we will endeavor to give time on this side to those in favor of the resolution.

Mr. COVINGTON. If the gentleman from Illinois expects to take care of those on that side who support the resolution, that will be agreeable.

Mr. MANN. We will take care of them, in part anyhow. I think there will be no trouble about that.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate on this resolution be limited to five hours, two hours and a half to be controlled by myself and two hours and a half by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MURDOCK rose.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from West Virginia yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. I would like to say to the gentleman from West Virginia that I would like to make an arrangement for time, although I do not known that anyone desires to speak on it. Will the gentleman from Illinois give me some time?

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes; the gentleman would be entitled to a portion of the time.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this resolution be limited to five hours, two hours and a half of which is to be controlled by myself and two hours and a half by the gentleman from Illinois; that at the end of that time the previous question be considered as ordered on the resolution and all amendments thereto.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman asks that the previous question be considered as ordered on the resolution and all amendments thereto. I would like to couple with that the right of gentlemen to offer amendments.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia asks unanimous consent that debate on this resolution be limited to five hours, one half of the time to be controlled by himself and the other half to be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]; that at the end of the five hours, or sooner if the debate ends, the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the resolution and all amendments thereto. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, the resolution which has just been read from the Clerk's desk is offered by unanimous instruction of the special committee created by House resolution No. 59.

By that resolution the committee was charged with a double duty—first, to investigate whether or not a current rumor to the effect that an assault has been committed upon a Member of the House because of words spoken on this floor was or was not true; and, second, if that rumor were found to be true to recommend to the House such procedure as should be thereupon had. In conformity with the resolution your committee proceeded to investigate the facts, and reports that such an assault as reported in fact occurred. It is well, perhaps, that the facts should be beyond all possibility of dispute, and that the House can proceed to such action as its judgment may direct without fear that any person will be injured or any inadvertent error committed because of a conflict of testimony. By the testimony of eyewitnesses present at the time of the occurrence, by subsequent oral statements made by the gentleman now accused and later by his voluntary written admission, it conclusively appears that on the 18th day of April last Mr. Charles C. Glover made a personal attack upon Representative THETUS W. SIMS, of Tennessee, and that the provoking cause of that attack was words spoken by Representative SIMS upon the floor of this House during the sessions of the Sixty-second Congress.

With the questions of fact so simplified, Mr. Speaker, there remains to be considered by the House the law affecting its power, and if it shall conclude that it has power and disposition to punish, the appropriate punishment will then be determined upon. Your special committee is not divided in opinion either as to the law of the case or the course to be pursued.

It is not necessary to indulge in any discussion of the general scope of congressional privilege or to attempt any detailed definition of the privileges of the House. Again and again, both this body and the courts have declined to catalogue, limit, or define either the privileges of the House or of its Members, for the very obvious reason that an incomplete definition might afterwards be treated as a surrender of privileges rightfully belonging to the House. By the admitted facts, however, as I have stated, it is clear that in this instance a constitutional privilege of the highest and most sacred character has been invaded.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question at this time?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from West Virginia yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. I do.

Mr. DYER. Did the committee which had this matter under consideration go into the statements made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], which apparently were what caused the dispute or assault? Did the committee take that into consideration, or did the committee deem it pertinent to the question at issue to go into the matter of what was said by the gentleman from Tennessee upon the floor of this House which caused the assault by Mr. Glover?

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. The committee did not in any particular enter into that question, and it may as well be stated now as later that the committee did not regard this controversy as in any sense a personal one between the gentlemen involved. It did not concern itself with the degree of provocation which the accused believed he had suffered, nor did it attempt to determine whether the charges which were the cause of his irritation were well founded or not, and for reasons which I shall assign in a moment the committee believes that to be absolutely immaterial to the question before the House.

Mr. CULLOP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. Yes.

Mr. CULLOP. What difference would it make as to whether you had examined into that question or not, because that is not the gravamen of the action? The gravamen of the action is the attack on the Member, irrespective of what brought it about.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I yielded to the gentleman for a question, and I think I have already answered the question. I agree with the statement of the gentleman which followed his question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to admonish Members that the rule about interruptions is that the gentleman who desires to interrupt shall first address the Chair, and then the Chair asks the gentleman who has the floor whether he will yield; and gentlemen must not address each other in the second person. The rule at first does not seem to have any great amount of sense in it, but when it is considered in all its bearings it will be seen that that is the way to keep order in the House.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT. Would not the provocation which was offered have some bearing upon the amount of punishment inflicted by the House?

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. In my judgment it would not. That is a matter which, of course, every Member of the House must for himself determine.

Mr. GILLETT. The gentleman, I presume, will deal with that point in due course.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. That will naturally arise in the course of the proceedings. Now, with the permission of the House, I shall decline to yield further until I have made my statement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia gives notice that he declines to yield further.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. In opening the discussion of this resolution I desire on behalf of the committee to give a brief outline of the position they have assumed, and until I have stated it with reasonable fullness I must ask to be excused from yielding to further questions.

The constitutional privilege which has been invaded is, of course, Mr. Speaker, in the mind of every Member of the House. The sixth clause of Article I of the Constitution provides that Senators and Representatives shall be privileged from arrest during their attendance at the sessions of their respective Houses and in going to and returning from the same, and that for any speech or debate in either House they shall not be questioned in any other place. These two great immunities are the defense and the support of every legislative body. They are indispensable to the proper exercise of its functions, and even if not provided by the express language of the Constitution, the very necessity of the case and the whole history of parliamentary government would have justified the conclusion that they had been conferred by implication. How vital the makers of the Constitution deemed this freedom of speech becomes at once apparent when we consider the sweeping language in which it was conferred.

In the first place, the express language of the Constitution is that Senators and Representatives shall not be questioned in any other place, thus making the immunity absolutely unrestricted in point of space, whether it be a court, a similar assembly, a popular gathering, a public highway, or a private chamber. All are included in this general phrase.

In the second place, this immunity is left absolutely unrestricted in point of time. No attempt is made to set a period beyond which a Member shall be no longer protected; but from the moment when words are spoken upon this floor to the very day of his death there is extended over him at all times the shield of the Constitution.

This immunity again arises not from some but from all forms of congressional activity. While the language of the Constitution is "for any speech or debate," it has been repeatedly held both by this body and by the courts that these words include everything that may be done upon this floor. As the Supreme Court of the United States has said in Kilbourn v. Thompson (103 U. S., 168):

> It would be a narrow view of the constitutional provision to limit it to words spoken in debate. The reason of the rule is as forcible in its application to written reports presented in that body by its committees, to resolutions offered which, though in writing, must be reproduced in speech, and to the act of voting, whether it is done vocally or by passing between the tellers. In short, to things generally done in a session of the House by one of its Members in relation to the business before it.

And, lastly, Mr. Speaker, it may be observed that this immunity is not only unlimited in space and time and subject matter, but is equally so as to the manner in which it may be infringed.

That is to say, the Constitution, in using the word "questioned," adds to this immunity an element equally sweeping and all inclusive with those which I have named. It is intended by this language to provide not only that a Member shall not be questioned in a court of law, either by civil action or criminal proceeding, but that he shall not be questioned in any other way which may tend to put him in fear. He is to enjoy absolute and unrestricted freedom of debate and action, knowing that there is neither court nor official nor man nor mob that can assail him for the words that he has used. He is protected from personal assault by force and arms. He is even protected from verbal abuse and assault for this cause. As stated in the report, it is obvious that if one may not question a Member for words spoken in debate under the processes of law, he can not do so by taking the law into his own hands.

Now, what I have said so far relates primarily to the immunity which the Member himself enjoys, and from this standpoint I believe it has been correctly described; but in the case now under discussion we are not concerned with the personal immunity enjoyed by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS]. He has the right to plead that immunity at any time when attack may be made upon him and to use it for his own protection wheresoever he may choose, but the reason for the resolution now before the House is that the House itself has an interest in the immunity wholly apart from that of the individual Member. It will be at once conceded not only that each Member should be left free in counsel and debate, but that the House as an aggregate whole must enjoy a similar freedom, and that as an aggregate whole composed of individual units it has a right to the free participation of each one of its constituent Members. Thus, whenever the privilege of a single Member is invaded, whenever he is deprived of the protection afforded to him by the Constitution, the collective whole, of which he is but a single unit, is weakened just that much. If his attendance upon Congress is prevented, the numerical strength of the body is diminished. If in his actions in Congress he is intimidated, the moral force of the body is impaired to that extent. So it is that every parliamentary body of which any record has been preserved has always treated an attack upon the constitutional privileges of a member as an attack upon itself.

Now, it may be asked whether the interest which the House sustains in a Member's privilege and the right to punish its invasion is as imperishable and as permanent as the Member's interest in his own privilege. It is not necessary for the present case to determine that question. I confess, speaking only for myself and not for the members of the special committee, that I think the time does come when the House as a House ceases to be interested in the protection of a Member's privilege, but I think that time comes only when the Member has ceased to be a part of this body. So long as he is a Member of the body, the injury done to him weakens its joint and coordinate strength.

The speech or debate may have been made in a preceding Congress, as in this instance, or they may have been uttered in the present Congress; but, in the opinion of myself and my colleagues, the wrong and injury that is done to the House itself is not measured by this consideration. If a Member having uttered the objectionable words in a preceding Congress enters this body, he comes in clothed with the imperishable cloak of an immunity already earned, and in order that in this present session he may join his co-Members in the full and untrammeled performance of their common functions he is entitled to all the protection which the Constitution gives him. If his constitutional protection is denied him or his constitutional right invaded, it does not matter to the House as a House when the Member secured his immunity, but it does grievously matter to the House when the attack is made upon him. If in after years a Member goes from this body back to the ranks of private citizenship of the country and is then questioned for his speeches or debates, it may well be that as to the House he then stands on the same plane as other private citizens.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. What is the remedy for a man who has served here but is now a private citizen?

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. He has his remedy under the civil law. He may plead his immunity in bar of a civil action. He may plead it in bar of a criminal prosecution; and as to his body, his person, his good name, he has the same protection that every other man has under the civil and criminal law.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from West Virginia yield to the gentleman from South Dakota?

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. If the gentleman will be good enough to make it very short, I will.

Mr. MARTIN. The gentleman has stated that, in his opinion, the interest of the House in the immunity of the Member may cease when the Member leaves this body. I would like to suggest to the gentleman whether he may not be in error upon that point. Is it not likely that if a Member could be called to violent account for official statements made on the floor of the House when he is a Member, and it could be known that he would be called to account for it when his membership ceases, it would interfere with the full and free utterance of Members of the House?

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. I recognize the force of the gentleman's suggestion, and I ask the pardon of the House for interjecting my own opinion, and thus, to that extent, raising an issue foreign to the case we are considering.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] a few moments ago asked that he be not interrupted until he gets through with his argument in the matter, and the Chair will do his best to keep everybody off of him [applause], and hopes the Members themselves will pay attention to the gentleman's request not to be interrupted.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. Now, Mr. Speaker, the position which I have outlined in these general terms is amply supported by the precedents of this House, by the precedents of other parliamentary bodies, and by the decisions of the courts. Within the limited time that I expect to occupy I can not hope to call attention to all these precedents or to discuss them in full.

The recorded cases in England run back to the middle of the sixteenth century, and from that date to this the House of Commons has regarded an attack upon its members for words spoken in debate as a breach of the privileges of the House and a contempt of its authority. This contempt it has again and again punished.

The colonial assemblies claimed a similar privilege and power. In 1691 the Assembly of New York, for instance, took into custody George Webb for insulting and R. Richards for assaulting a member. Before the formation of the present Government, while Congress sat under the Articles of Confederation, a challenge was sent in the year 1777, under the dueling custom then in force, to a distinguished Member of that Congress, Gunning Bedford, by reason of words spoken in debate.

This was held to be an infraction of the privileges of Congress and was punished as such.

In the year 1832 there occurred the famous attack of Samuel Houston upon William Stanberry, a Member of the House from the State of Ohio, for words spoken in debate upon the floor. Houston, who had been a Member of this House but was no longer so, attacked Stanberry on the street but a short distance from this building and grievously wounded him. The matter was called to the attention of the House by a proceeding similar to that we have suggested here, and after a most exhaustive debate—a debate the reading of which will more than repay those who have the time and inclination to indulge in it—after the power of the House to punish had been challenged in the most adroit and skillful of arguments and had been defended with even greater ability, the House decided by an emphatic majority that its privileges had been invaded, called the offender to the bar of the House in the custody of the Sergeant at Arms, and inflicted upon him an appropriate punishment.

Again, in the year 1857, two Members of the House went to the Senate Chamber at the other end of the Capitol and inflicted upon the person of Charles Sumner, a Senator from Massachusetts, a serious assault. The Senate considered the matter and decided that it had no power over the person of a Member of the coordinate branch of Congress, but remanded the offenders to their own House for punishment. The committee of the Senate, which recommended this action, added to its report by way of friendly admonition to the coordinate branch that—

> The judgment of the House has always held an assault upon a Member for words spoken in debate to be a violation of the privileges of the House.

We need not take time to discuss the subsequent history of the case, but the House took the position that its offending Members were punishable.

In the year 1865 a Member of the House was assaulted by reason of his official action. William D. Kelley was attacked by A. P. Field, who, not content with insulting him at a public table, followed this with a violent attack with an open knife, inflicting a painful wound upon Kelley, and threatening to shoot him before he went to bed. It is not surprising that the House considered this a breach of privilege, and it must be conceded that the penalty of a reprimand at the bar of the House seems hardly appropriate to the offense. In delivering his reprimand, Speaker Colfax said:

> In this Hall assemble those who have been chosen by the suffrage of their constituents throughout the continental area of the Republic to deliberate and decide upon the gravest matters of national concern. Differing, often widely, from each other, their acts and votes on many questions may prove distasteful to large portions of the people for whom they legislate, and the Constitution has therefore wisely declared that no Representative shall be questioned elsewhere for words spoken here in debate. Accountable as every Representative is to this body with which he is associated, to which is reserved the right of expulsion for whatever renders him unworthy of its membership, the House has repeatedly decided that menace or assault by one Member upon another is a flagrant breach of privilege, rendering the offender amenable to whatever proper punishment it may see fit to inflict. And while thus subjecting a sworn associate to its discipline, it claims and exercises the right to fix the penalty against those not of the body itself who endeavor by threat or attack to interfere with the freest action of its Members.

Before the legislatures of the various States many similar proceedings have been had. In my judgment, Mr. Speaker, we are entirely justified in following these parliamentary precedents. The soundest motives of public policy and the most irrefutable reasons warrant our doing so, but we have the added support of learned text writers and distinguished jurists. Mr. Cushing, in his "Law of Legislative Assemblies," undertakes the bold task of enumerating the collective or aggregate privileges of a legislative assembly. I read from page 246 of the ninth edition:

> 610. The rights and immunities incident to or conferred upon a legislative assembly, considered as an aggregate body, are founded in the same general reason upon which those of the individual members rest, namely, to enable the assembly to perform the functions with which it is invested in a free, intelligent, and impartial manner.
> 611. The privileges of this kind, which belong to each branch of a legislative assembly, may be classified and arranged under the following heads, namely:
> 1. To judge of the returns, elections, and qualifications of its members.
> 2. To choose its own officers and remove them at pleasure.
> 3. To establish its own rules of proceeding.
> 4. To have the attendance and service of its members.
> 5. To be secret in its proceedings and debates.
> 6. To preserve its own honor, dignity, purity, and efficiency by the expulsion of an unworthy or the discharge of an incompetent member.
> 7. To protect itself and its members from personal violence.
> 8. To protect itself and its members from libelous and slanderous attacks.
> 9. To protect itself and its members from corruption.
> 10. To require information touching public affairs from the public officers.
> 11. To require the opinion of the judges and other law officers on important occasions.
> 12. To investigate, by the testimony of witnesses or otherwise, any subject or matter in reference to which it has power to act, and consequently to protect parties, witnesses, and counsel in their attendance when summoned or having occasion to attend for that purpose.
> 13. To be free from all interference of the other coordinate branch and of the executive and judiciary departments in its proceedings on any matter depending before it.

Later on he says (p. 251):

> 628. All attacks upon the persons of the members or officers of a legislative assembly or others attending and privileged, as witnesses and parties, whether by actual violence or by threats, and all disorders in, near, or about the place of sitting have been always deemed high breaches of privilege and punishable accordingly.

One after another of the highest courts of the various States have declared that the authority to punish a breach of privilege is a necessary incident, inherent in the very organization of legislative bodies as well as in courts of law or equity, independent of statutory provisions. I quote some of these authorities:

> The authority to punish contempts is a necessary incident, inherent in the very organization of all legislative bodies and of all courts of law or equity, independent of statute provisions. (State v. Mathews, 37 N. H., 450.)
> The right to punish for contempts in a summary manner has long been admitted as inherent in all courts of justice and in legislative assemblies, founded upon great principles which are coeval and must be coexistent with the administration of justice in every country—the power of self-protection. And it is only where this right has been claimed to a greater extent than this and the foundation sought to be laid for extensive classes of contempts, not legitimately and necessarily sustained by these great principles, that it has been contested. It is a branch of the common law brought from the mother country and sanctioned by our Constitution. The discretion involved in the power is necessarily in a great measure arbitrary and undefinable, and yet the experience of ages has demonstrated that it is compatible with civil liberty and auxiliary to the purest ends of justice and to the proper exercise of the legislative functions, especially when these functions are exerted by a legislative assembly. (Neel v. State, 9 Ark., 259.)
> I find it asserted and uniformly conceded a common-law principle that not only may a legislative body inflict punishment on its members who may be guilty of contempt, but it may impose like penalties on other persons who may commit disorder in the presence of such body or who may ignore or treat with contempt its lawful process or be guilty of such other acts before the House or its committee as will tend directly and necessarily to defeat, embarrass, or obstruct its proceedings. This is a power inherent in the House or bodies composing the legislative branch, and for the exercise thereof no express constitutional provision is required; such power exists whether so conferred or not. (Lowe v. Summers, 69 Mo. App., 649.)
> The right of punishing for contempts by summary conviction is inherent in all courts of justice and legislative assemblies and is essential for their protection and existence. It is a branch of the common law adopted and sanctioned by our State constitution. The discretion involved in this power is in a great measure arbitrary and undefinable, and yet the experience of ages has demonstrated that it is perfectly compatible with civil liberty and auxiliary to the purest ends of justice. (Yates v. Lansing, 9 Johns., 417.)

Across the water the courts of England have always held that the House of Commons possessed this power. In the case of Burdett v. Abbott (14 East's Repts., 1), Lord Ellenboro describes the power and the reason for its existence in this language:

> The privileges which belong to them seem at all times to have been, and necessarily must be, inherent in them, independent of any precedent; it was necessary that they should have the most complete personal security to enable them freely to meet for the purpose of discharging their important functions, and also that they should have the right of self-protection—I do not mean merely against acts of individual wrong—for poor and impotent indeed would be the privileges of Parliament if they could not also protect themselves against injuries and affronts offered to the aggregate body which might prevent or impede the full and effectual exercise of their parliamentary functions. This is an essential right necessarily inherent in the supreme legislature of the Kingdom, and of course as necessarily inherent in the Parliament assembled in the two Houses as in one. The right of self-protection implies, as a consequence, a right to use the necessary means for rendering such self-protection effectual. Independently, therefore, of any precedents or recognized practice on the subject, such a body must a priori be armed with a competent authority to enforce the free and independent exercise of its own proper functions, whatever those functions might be.

Of course, it has been asserted that precedents arising in the House of Commons are without authority here because of the historical fact that in the dim past Commons and Lords sat as a single body, with judicial and legislative power, and because of the suggestion that when they separated the right to try and punish for contempt was retained by the Commons as a sort of judicial residuum and not as inherent in the constitution of the House itself. But, echoing the words of Lord Ellenboro, this seems more a matter of antiquarian curiosity than legal importance. The decisions of the State courts with reference to the State legislatures may also be objected to as precedents for this body, because State legislatures are not restricted by the doctrine of granted or delegated power.

But we need not perplex ourselves with these fine distinctions, for there is ample warrant in express decisions for this claim of power by the House of Representatives.

In the famous case of Anderson v. Dunn (6 Wheat., 204) the question was raised and decided by the Supreme Court of the United States as long ago as the year 1832. For offering a bribe to influence a Member's action on this floor. John Anderson was held in contempt of the House, arrested, and punished. After his discharge he brought an action of trespass against the Sergeant at Arms of the House for false arrest. The court held without dissent that the House had power to investigate and punish a breach of its privilege, and that the warrant of the House to its Speaker was an absolute defense to the suit brought against him.

This decision was accepted without question and followed year after year for half a century.

In 1848 the Senate imprisoned James Nugent for publishing a secret treaty, and the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Columbia refused to discharge him upon habeas corpus.

In the year 1860 the question arose on a curious state of facts before the Superior Court of the State of New York. A debtor in the State of New York was under imprisonment for debt when the House of Representatives found him guilty of a contempt in refusing to testify before it. The Sergeant at Arms was dispatched to New York, took the debtor from the custody of the sheriff, and set him at the bar of the House. Thereupon his creditor sued the sheriff for permitting him to escape, and the sheriff defended by setting up the process of the House of Representatives. The court held that upon a charge of contempt and breach of privilege the House has power to cause the person charged to be taken into custody and brought to its bar to answer. (See Wickelhausen v. Willett, 10 Abbott's Prac. Repts., 164, and 1 Keyes, 521.)

In 1874 there occurred the famous case of Stewart against Blaine, where suit was brought against Mr. Speaker Blaine for causing the arrest of a contumacious witness. The Supreme Court of the District of Columbia held that the House of Representatives has power to punish for contempt, and that its order directing a commitment is a complete protection to the Speaker who directs the Sergeant at Arms to take the offender into custody. In this case the court said:

> The question of power to punish for contempt in the case now before the court was settled by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Anderson v. Dunn (6 Wheat., 204) more than half a century ago after a stout contest and upon thorough deliberation. This authority has been uniformly acquiesced in for over 50 years, and until reversed must be regarded as conclusive with this court. (See Stewart v. Blaine, 1 McArthur, 453.)

When the application of Richard B. Irwin for release from the custody of Ben G. Ordway, Sergeant at Arms of the House in 1874, was made, Judge Arthur McArthur, of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, followed the same doctrine.

Now, I know it will be said that the Supreme Court about faced on this question, and that after subordinate courts had followed Anderson against Dunn for over half a century, in the case of Kilbourn v. Thompson (103 U. S., 168), decided in 1880, the court changed its ruling and declared the House powerless to protect itself. I shall not take time to analyze that case because I know that other gentlemen will speak in the course of this debate who are fully prepared to do so. It is discussed at some length in the report filed by your committee, and I simply call attention to the fact that so far from deciding that the House is without power to punish for contempt, the court, in the Kilbourn case, expressly reserved that question and finally decided but two single propositions, viz:

First. That the courts have the right to inquire whether in punishing for contempt in a given case Congress has exceeded its power; and

Second. That where Congress attempts an investigation of a subject into which it has no jurisdiction to inquire it has no power to punish for contempt a witness who refuses to testify. And as against the discussion indulged in by the learned justice who wrote the opinion in the Kilbourn case, I offer the subsequent declaration made by the same court in the Chapman case (166 U. S., 661), to the effect that—

> Congress can not divest itself or either of its Houses of the inherent power to punish for contempt.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to trespass further upon the time of the House in opening this discussion. I think it proper to repeat what I have already stated, that this proceeding is in no sense a private controversy nor should it be so treated. I think it proper further to say that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], whose personal privilege has been invaded, has at no time sought to make this body the avenger of his injury. This proceeding was not instigated by him nor has he moved your committee to any action in regard to it. His appearance before us was in no sense voluntary and his attitude has been dignified and beyond the reach of criticism.

But the Constitution has drawn around every Member of the House and around the House itself a circle of fire not to be lightly invaded nor to be entered upon without penalty and punishment. It has clothed this body with ample power to protect itself without awaiting the express action of the coordinate branch and without appealing to the Executive or the judiciary. It has made it the forum for free and unrestricted debate. The grant of these powers and these privileges makes it not only the right, but the duty of the House to defend them against all attack. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, acting under instructions heretofore given us, your committee moves the adoption of the resolution just submitted. [Applause.]

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from West Virginia yield to the gentleman from South Dakota?

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. I do.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, I understood in answer to the question of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] that probably the gentleman from West Virginia would give the House his view as to whether the extent of provocation ought to be considered in connection with the measure of punishment. I think that the courts would generally take that into consideration. Does the gentleman consider that the nature or character of the provocation which might be given would be a proper matter to consider in connection with the extent of punishment to be meted out by the House?

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I can only repeat what I said before—that I think every Member of this House having to vote on that question, and it being solely a question addressing itself to his individual discretion, must resort to such information as he thinks proper to move upon his discretion. For myself, I think the testimony taken by the committee and appearing in the RECORD furnishes all the information which is needed for a just and correct determination as to the question of punishment.

Mr. FOWLER rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Illinois rise?

Mr. FOWLER. To propound a question to the gentleman who has just concluded his remarks.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from West Virginia yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER]?

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I must decline to take further time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield and asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, it is only one short question that I desire to ask.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman persists, I will endeavor to answer his question.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, this assault was committed because of words spoken in another Congress. Suppose the Sixty-third Congress should pass this by, and that it did not see fit to call the assailant to account for his deed, does the gentleman think that the Sixty-fourth Congress under the powers of the Constitution would have a right to call in question the assault and battery which has been committed during this Congress?

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I must decline to enter into a discussion of that question, because it raises an hypothesis in no way related to this case.

Mr. FOWLER. I only wanted information, because I thought the gentleman had gone into the question fully.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman had been in the Hall earlier, he would have heard that or a similar question propounded and a discussion upon it, which, however, I am frank to admit was somewhat of a digression.

Mr. FOWLER. I have been here all of the time and I have heard no such question asked.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON].

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, it is certainly with no degree of pleasure that I rise to support the adoption of this resolution. This whole affair, in any view we may take of it, is exceedingly unfortunate. To me it seems hardly essential that I enter into any extended discussion of the legal features of the case after the presentation of the splendid report and the very able argument of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS]. That the Congress of the United States has power to punish an offender for a breach of its privilege seems to be so very clear as not to admit of debate. A deliberative body like this is in many respects analogous to a judicial tribunal, and the power is inherent in every judicial tribunal to protect itself in order that in an orderly way it may administer the law to protect life, liberty, and property. So the power is inherent in a deliberative body, the lawmaking body, to protect itself and its membership for the same purpose. But there has been a question raised from the very beginning of jurisprudence as to the extent of the inherent power that exists both in legislative and judicial bodies. It has never, however, in all the history of these proceedings been questioned that a court had the power to punish for a contempt committed in its presence. Nobody disputes that. It was never disputed that a court had the power to punish for the violation of its processes issued for the purpose of the enforcement of law.

But it has been questioned at times as to how far the power of the judicial tribunal extends for the punishment of one using opprobrious and offensive language against the judges of a court, but the consensus of opinion seems to be that where such language tended to bring into ridicule and contempt a tribunal that the power existed. As to the question of the punishment that was always left to the sound judgment and discretion of the court and had no other limitation in the absence of a statute. That same rule would apply to a deliberative body; but the framers of the Federal Constitution wisely foresaw the troubles that might arise along this line, and for the protection of a Member of the House and the integrity of a legislative body they placed an express provision in the Constitution of the United States that prevented any Representative or Senator from being questioned for any words spoken in debate save on the floor of the body where spoken. This is essential to maintain the integrity of the body and the sanctity of its deliberations. Therefore you do not have to resort to the implied power to punish for contempt as inherent in these bodies, but there stands the expressed constitutional prohibition against conduct destructive of the welfare of the legislative power. It is no dormant provision lying in the Constitution that needs a legislative enactment to give it vitality. It stands there as a shield to law and order of the men called upon to participate in the deliberations of the country. It was wisely, it was purposely, placed there; it was placed there to meet the exigencies of a case like this. It may be said that no punishment has been provided by statute. I remarked before, the question of punishment is limited only by the sound judgment and discretion of the tribunal offended. Gentlemen have said that because the words were spoken in one Congress and the offense was committed after the meeting of another that possibly this House would be without jurisdiction. The Congress is a continuous body. It never dies. Its membership may die, but the Congress lives forever, just as the courts of your country do. This power to punish exists so long as it has the will to punish for the infraction of its dignity and its constitutional rights and privileges. But, as I remarked, I will desist from any lengthy discussion of the legal questions involved on account of the presentation that has already been made.

In answer to the distinguished gentleman who stated that the facts ought to be made known clearly here that led up to and induced such infraction of the rules of the House as a basis to enable us to determine the measure of punishment if the House agrees that this offender should be punished I concur. While the right to punish exists upon confessions made by Mr. Glover, the real facts that induced this assault ought to be brought to the consideration of the House. I have therefore prepared a brief statement, an abstract of the facts as they appear from the record and in the evidence, that shows the foundation of this whole assault and the animus and the contempt that lies in it. Permit me to read just for a moment a page or two. I take this question from its inception, and I now present you the facts upon which you must act. I think there is no question about your legal power. For several years prior to March 3, 1909, there had been pending before the House and Senate a proposition by way of a bill or amendment to a bill to accept and pay for about 100 acres of land situated between Connecticut and Massachusetts Avenues, Washington, D. C., and running out westwardly to the Cathedral School, on which Mr. C. C. Glover held an option from the owners, at the price of $420,000, or about $4,000 per acre. Mark you this: It is an option held and owned by him, the land to be used for a park or park purposes. Mr. Glover had appeared before the Appropriations Committee of the House of Representatives to advocate legislation authorizing the purchase of the land upon which he held the option. What he said before that committee appears in print. The hearing was had on the 15th day of May, 1908. In the hearing he claimed the land was advancing in value very rapidly, and that unless the Government accepted the land at the price named in his option a much higher price would have to be paid for the land. Finally a bill was passed in the Senate in 1908, being Senate bill No. 4441, Sixtieth Congress, making an appropriation of $423,000 with which to acquire the land. On the 26th day of May, 1908, a motion to suspend the rules and pass Senate bill No. 4441 was made in the House. The bill failed to pass by a vote of 164 to 57. It remained on the calendar, and on the 3d of March, 1909, being the last day of that Congress, a motion was again made to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman state to the House what he is reading from; is that the speech of Mr. SIMS?

Mr. MOON. Oh, no; it is not a speech of anybody's; it is an abstract from the record showing the facts. I refer to the record and the pages.

Mr. DYER. Is it testimony before the committee?

Mr. MOON. Yes; I have given you the date.

Mr. CLAYTON. You are on the statement of facts.

Mr. MOON. It is an abstract, as I stated before, of the record of facts.

Mr. SIMS took no part in the discussion that took place when the bill was under consideration on the 26th of May, 1908, but was yielded five minutes' time in opposition to the bill when it was considered under motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill on March 3, 1909.

In his speech at that time he said in substance that the price named in the option was much lower than had been asked for the land covered by the option prior thereto. He made this statement as a refutation of the claim made in behalf of the bill that the land was rapidly advancing in price. But in addition to these statements as to the value of the land he charged that a Member of the House at that time owned an interest in some of the land covered by the Glover option, and that the fact that a Member owned part of the land had been kept secret by Mr. Glover. He strongly opposed the passage of the bill on that account. On March 3, 1909, the bill again failed of passage by a vote of 192 against it to 31 for it.

Let me stop here to observe for a moment, Is it cause for an assault on a man that he attempts to stop the passage of a bill of this character, tending to speculate on the National Treasury when sitting in the House at the time of the passage?

On December 30, 1912, being 3 years and 10 months from the time Mr. SIMS made the speech against this bill on March 3, 1909, Mr. C. C. Glover, under oath, in a statement before a subcommittee of the House Committee on the District of Columbia, not bearing on the matters then under investigation by said subcommittee, but referring to the attempt to pass Senate bill 4441, on March 3, 1909, said that a statement which Glover claimed Mr. SIMS had made in his speech on March 3, 1909, with reference to the price he. Glover, had asked for the land, was an "absolute and unqualified falsehood."

What is the meaning of that? Does not that show malice? Does not that show the degree of enmity was so exceedingly great that after so long a lapse of time the truth that had been made known in reference to the conduct of this man still so hurt him that he took an opportunity on an occasion when such matters should not have been mentioned to denounce SIMS as an unqualified liar?

C. C. Glover caused to be printed in full his statement about Mr. SIMS made before said subcommittee in a morning paper in the city of Washington. On January 15, 1913, Mr. SIMS arose to a question of personal privilege and made a reply to the charges of Mr. Glover before said subcommittee in defense of himself, which speech appears on page 1913 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and following pages—January 15, 1913. In this speech there was no use of defamatory language against Mr. Glover, but notwithstanding this fact Glover had published in all the newspapers of Washington a statement of about 10 columns in length as paid advertising matter containing many charges against Mr. SIMS with reference to said option transaction, and in it published what he claimed to be a true copy of his original option on the land and the extension of same.

On February 5, 1913, Mr. SIMS again arose to a question of personal privilege in defense of himself against the charges made by Glover in the last statement of said Glover. In this last statement Mr. SIMS claimed that the statements of Glover before the subcommitee regarding the option and renewal or extension of same as to the length of time it had to run and as to the length of time of the extension as shown by the copy of option and extension as published in the newspapers by Glover was a false statement, and made under oath with full knowledge that it was false, as he showed by his statement in the papers that he had possession of the option and knew all its terms and stipulations. Both speeches of Mr. SIMS made January 15 and February 5, respectively, were made in defense of charges made against him by Mr. Glover and published by his direction and at his expense as paid advertising in the Washington newspapers, making charges of willful falsehood against Mr. SIMS as to material statements made on the floor of the House in connection with and pertinent to said Senate bill No. 4441.

In the charges made in the newspaper statement by Mr. Glover on January 25 he claimed that the charges made by Mr. SIMS in his five-minute speech March 3, 1909, caused said Senate bill to be defeated.

By possession of the papers he showed that he had knowledge and knew of the speculation. He knew that it had defeated this bill. That was the cause of his grievance against him. Not that SIMS had stood upon the floor of this House and used defamatory language in reference to him and sought under the protection of the Constitution to defend himself against Glover from such charges, but that SIMS had defeated a measure in which he had a pecuniary interest. Listen again.

In Mr. SIMS's speeches of January 15, 1913, and February 5, 1913, he showed that more than two years after the Senate bill 4441 was defeated part of the land embraced in and covered by the said option had been given by the owners of the lands to the Government or District of Columbia for park purposes, amounting to 17½ acres, and that by the defeat of the bill the Government had been saved a sum of about $70,000. The price of $4,000 per acre was the option price. Mr. Glover had stated in the hearing before the House Committee on Appropriations that not an acre of the land covered by his option could be purchased for less than $6,000 or $8,000 if said option expired. But it was shown by Mr. SIMS that after the option had expired, instead of asking and obtaining $6,000 or $8,000 per acre for every acre of the land, as had been stated to be the fact by Mr. Glover, that the owners actually gave away 17½ acres of the same.

It thus appears that by the action of Mr. SIMS in exposing the secret-option dealing by Mr. Glover with a Member of the House of Representatives, who at least would have had an opportunity to vote to take money out of the Treasury of the United States with which to pay for lands owned by himself and held by Glover under the option, the bill was defeated and a great public service rendered in bringing to light the means used in putting off on the Government at high prices lands so valueless as to be donated to the Government by the true owners of same after the bill had failed.

Now, another view of the facts. But I am reciting these facts to do that which ought to be done in every case, not only determining what ought to be done by the House toward an offender but if convicted the measure of his punishment.

In the statement of Mr. Frederick Steckman, made before the special committee under oath, he stated that Mr. Glover, in giving his version of his striking Mr. SIMS, said:

> Since Mr. SIMS made his last speech on the floor of the House we never met until to-day. I have in a way kept a lookout for him, but never went out of my way to find him.

Ah, here is a man offended because of the legitimate, honest, and patriotic conduct of a Member of the House. He seeks him day after day, but never passing much out of his way to find him. He keeps a lookout. What for? That he may call in question that which the Member said on the floor of the House, inflict a punishment upon him, and stand in contempt of the Congress or a breach of the constitutional privileges of the House of Representatives. Is that what he intended? Listen again.

This statement shows that from February 5 until April 18 he was looking out for Mr. SIMS. A brave man would have at least demanded a retraction and given notice to Mr. SIMS that in case of a refusal he would take steps to redress his wrongs. But instead he came up behind him, unobserved, and, according to his own statement, took the law into his own hands.

It is shown by the testimony of Hon. BEN JOHNSON, an honored and distinguished Member of this House, that said Glover, about the middle of February, 1913, expressed the regret that there was a law against dueling, as he desired to challenge Mr. SIMS to fight a duel. No man who does not desire to shed the blood of his fellow man wants the law against dueling repealed.

These are the substantial facts in the case.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. FLOYD). The time of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] has expired.

Mr. MOON. Will the gentleman from West Virginia give me a little more time?

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] is recognized for 10 minutes more.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, the fact that this man wanted to fight a duel with Mr. SIMS about this transaction, about this legitimate discharge of duty on the part of the Representative from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], shows that Mr. Glover had murder in his heart; it shows that he not only had a contempt for the proceedings of this House, but that he wanted to kill the man that had thwarted him in his attempt to thrust his arms into the Treasury of the United States.

But, you say, "How was he to be benefited?" He had an interest in that option. He concealed the combination he had made with a Representative in the House to have that land purchased, lying hard by his own land, which would be improved more than all others by the purchase of the additional land by the Government.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we have seen the extent of Mr. SIMS's offending. He stood here to protect the interests of the Government. He recited the facts as they existed. He defeated the attempt to speculate on the Treasury. That, I think, the House ought to commend.

Let us see Mr. Glover's attitude. He owned the option. He was concealing from Members the interest of those who were partners with him in the option. He was to be benefited in two ways, directly and indirectly, in the result. The option defeated, he naturally becomes very angry. Why? He is a man who has hitherto stood high in public esteem for benevolent conduct, for progressiveness. These cold-blooded facts, presented in this House, changed in his mind, as in the mind of every good citizen, his relation to the public, so far as their opinion of his beneficent conduct was concerned. He was no longer the benefactor but the greedy speculator.

I have no doubt that it so preyed upon his mind as to produce that condition mentally which assassins have who seek revenge for wrongs conceived. These things transpired long before the assault by Glover upon Mr. SIMS. The assault did not arise on a sudden heat of passion. It was not the result of exasperation from a sense of suddenly offended honor. It was cold-blooded and deliberate and premeditated. Did it not partake of all the elements of the dastardly crime of murder? He sought Mr. SIMS.

Ah, he said he had hunted for him. This time he goes out of the way to find him. He goes into the park. He lies in wait for him. He waits until he comes, and proceeds to accost him, like a bandit demanding his money: "Why did you speak of me as you did? I demand an apology from you," was his language.

Mr. SIMS mildly, but frankly, refused an apology. What did Mr. Glover do then? Look at the calculation of the man. Did he strike Mr. SIMS down? He could have felled him to the earth with one blow if that had been his purpose. Was that what he wanted? He wanted to use that mere technical assault and then desist; so he struck Mr. SIMS on the face slightly as Mr. SIMS turned his face upon him, and then desisted.

What for? We are fools if we can not draw the inference of fact as well as of law from this course of procedure. He did it in order that Mr. SIMS might become the violent aggressor, and that he, Glover, would no longer be at fault, but that SIMS should be forced and provoked to make an assault upon him which was not proportionate to that which Glover had made upon Mr. SIMS, one not commensurate with that offense, in order that Glover might kill him and have a pretext to invoke the doctrine of self-defense on the ground that SIMS, in response to a mere technical assault, was seeking to kill him—Glover.

Mr. Speaker, such methods have always been the tactics of purse-proud cowards that sought assassination. But there was no time for any further action. Only a moment intervened until a passer-by stood between them. Mr. SIMS could not, perhaps, have struck him if he had desired to, under those conditions.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from South Dakota?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. DILLON. Is the gist of this offense assault and battery or is it the taking of a Member to task for words spoken in this Chamber?

Mr. MOON. Of course, it is the taking of a Member to task for words spoken in this Chamber; but if the House wants to know the malice and animus that provoked it, it must know the facts and the circumstances of the assault, so that it may determine the degree of the offense and the contempt that the man is guilty of.

Mr. DILLON. If that be true, then the assault and battery is a mere incident to the taking of the Member to task for words spoken in this House.

Mr. MOON. A Member may be taken to task in various ways, by assault and battery or otherwise.

Mr. DILLON. I want to know which is incidental, the assault and battery or the taking of the Member to task.

Mr. MOON. Of course the assault and battery is the means by which the man called in question the Member for the language used in the House. Everybody understands that it is for the breach of the privilege of the House, not the assault and battery upon Mr. SIMS.

Mr. Speaker, if SIMS had made the deadly assault I have referred to in response to the mere technical assault, then it would have afforded Glover the pretext to kill him. Do not the facts indicate that was his real purpose? What did he want to kill SIMS for? I take it, not for the loss of the money in this matter, but because of the degradation of his character before the public by the disclosure of these facts. Mr. Glover may be, and probably is, a very estimable gentleman under normal conditions, but surely he departed far from the path of rectitude and honor in this matter. Surely it took more courage on the part of Mr. SIMS, more of self-possession under the circumstances, not to resist the assault, knowing what it was intended for, in view of the threats that had been communicated to him, than it would have taken to defend himself effectually under the circumstances. Most of us would have had the impulse to strike back. Most of us would have done so; but I take it that the law-abiding man, who would not want murder to occur, who would not want the purposes of Glover to be carried out, would commend the conduct of Mr. SIMS under the circumstances.

Mr. Glover's conduct was not that of a law-abiding citizen. He evidently had no honorable purpose. It was not the evidence of a chivalrous nature. It was rather the dominancy of those low and debased instincts that sometimes creep out in human nature, the very essence of cowardice that degenerates into crime. Will it be said, here or anywhere, that the law-abiding citizen of this country who avoids assassination by failure to fall into the traps that men have set for his destruction is less brave, less chivalrous, less honorable than other men?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has again expired.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. I yield to the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I want to add just one word on the question of punishment. I surely have no desire to see this man punished. I have no personal grievance in the world against him. I only present the law and facts as they appear to me. If this House thinks that his offense was committed in an unguarded moment, in an hour of insanity, I would prefer to see this resolution wiped out of the way and nothing more done. This is not Mr. SIMS's prosecution. He has taken no part in it. He will take no part in it. Nothing you can do or ought to do will preclude him from that consideration of this question hereafter that he thinks it deserves. But, Mr. Speaker, if Mr. Glover was in the full possession of his faculties, if his conduct was malicious, if he intended felony, as the facts in this case would indicate, then it is a very high breach of the privileges of the House. A mere reprimand, under those conditions, would only add dignity to his offense and afford him pleasure to appear before you as a victim of the House whose dignity had been assaulted, but whose real dignity would seem to demand nothing more than a mere reprimand, where a punishment ought to be inflicted that would not only deter him and others from like offending, but give him time to reflect and to become a law-abiding citizen. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL].

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. How much time has been consumed on this side?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from West Virginia has consumed 72 minutes. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I take the position that the House of Representatives does not possess the inherent or the constitutional power to convert itself, by its sole resolution, into a judicial body with power to try the guilt or innocence, upon a question of fact, of a citizen when it is sought to exercise that power beyond the specified grants of the Constitution.

Let us see what we are doing in this case. The special committee appointed by the House has brought in a resolution that proposes, upon its adoption, to convert this House into a court—and in this case it should properly be called a police court—to try a case of assault and battery occurring in one of the parks of the city of Washington. But it is urged by the committee that this is done because the assault was committed by a citizen upon a Member of the House of Representatives for words spoken in debate upon the floor. I shall refer later to that. It is urged, therefore, that in order to preserve the ancient dignity of a parliamentary body and to preserve the privileges of the House of Representatives, we must assume the exercise of this extraordinary power.

The adoption of this resolution will convert the House into a court, and make of the Speaker, if you please, a police judge, authorizing such court to have a jury of 444 summoned from the remotest bounds of the Republic, a Republic so vast in extent of empire that these men come from regions of perpetual winter and zones of a never ending summer, all to try a case of assault and battery.

But, it is urged, we must preserve the dignity of the House of Representatives! The authority of the House of Representatives to assume such extraordinary power is based upon the ancient precedents of the Parliament of Great Britain to inflict punishment upon those who were guilty of contempt of its dignity.

It is stated by the chairman of the committee, in quoting a dictum of Lord Ellenborough in Burdette against Abbott, that Parliament had the inherent power to punish for all contempts of its authority or privileges. The Parliament of England exercised that power for generations, and, as the chairman of the committee well anticipated, the exercise of the authority and power to try a question after the fact as a court was because the Parliament of Great Britain had at one time been a portion of the supreme judicial power of Great Britain. When the Parliament divided the House of Commons still retained a residuum of that power and still exercises it to punish for certain contempts.

But the Constitution of the United States has not granted to this House the power and authority to try a man on a question after the fact for an alleged offense committed outside of its presence that is not specifically named in the powers granted by the Constitution. The Constitution specifically names those offenses of which this body is the judge and for the trial of which a contumacious witness in an impeachment case might be sent to jail by order of the Speaker of the House.

It is also judge of the election of its own Members. It may, and does, under the authority granted, convert itself into a trial court to try the question of fact whether or not a Member sits here by authority of his constituents, and may punish a contumacious witness in the trial of that question of fact.

But here it is proposed to try a question of fact after an assault and battery has been committeed in one of the parks of the District of Columbia. On what authority? The committee says upon the authority of an ancient necessity of the parliaments of the world to protect themselves from an invasion of their privileges by a citizen. But the Constitution limits the powers of Congress in the length to which it may go even to protect its privileges or dignity; it at the same time throws about every citizen of the Republic, no matter how humble he may be, no matter in what portion he may reside, the equal protection of the law and the right to a trial by jury for offenses committed against the law. The law forbidding assault and battery includes Members of Congress within the scope of its protection.

What is proposed by this resolution? The denial of the right of trial by jury in a case of assault and battery. What does this resolution propose? To deny the equal protection of the law. We are giving, in this case, by our sole resolution, a dignified court, with the Speaker of the House as its presiding officer and all these Members assembled from the farthest confines of this great country to act as jurors for the trial of one of the citizens of the District. We have not placed any limitation upon ourselves, and no one knows what punishment we may inflict. There are no limitations if we assume the power; if we assume the power it is absolute. The citizen may be reprimanded; he may be fined; he may be sent to prison. What, under the statement of the chairman of the committee, are the limitations? He says there are none, and we may send the respondent to the gallows or the electric chair; and it is claimed there is no appeal from our decision.

The proceeding is unusual and the punishment may be unusual; the court, when we are converted into one, will be unusual.

Mr. COVINGTON rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kansas yield to the gentleman from Maryland?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I would prefer to go on, but I yield for a short question.

Mr. COVINGTON. Does the gentleman not know that the Supreme Court itself in the Anderson-Dunn case holds, and that in the unbroken line of constitutional authority in this case it is held, that the limitation of the House of Representatives for punishment is to such punishment as will expire at the time that the House itself shall pass out of existence?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Oh, yes; that is stated in the Anderson case, but we are not bound by the Anderson case, if the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] correctly stated the privileges of the House. The lex et consuetudo parliamenti has no limitations.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kansas yield to the gentleman from West Virginia?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I am sure the gentleman from West Virginia will appreciate the necessity of my proceeding, but I yield.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. I understood the gentleman to quote the chairman of the committee as saying that there was no limit except the lex et consuetudo parliamenti. Does not the gentleman admit that the punishment shall not exceed the life of the body which inflicts it?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes; but in the exercise of that power what are the limitations within that time? There are none, and there is no appeal from our decision when we assume to act.

But the right to punish for an assault upon a Member of the House is not up for the first time. The question was up in the Constitutional Convention, and on the 20th day of August, 1787, Mr. Pinckney submitted, among other things, this proposition:

> Each House shall be the judge of its own privileges, and shall have authority to punish by imprisonment every person violating the same, or who, in the place where the Legislature may be sitting and during the time of its sessions, shall threaten any of its Members for anything said or done in the House, or who shall assault any of its Members.

The fathers who gave us the Constitution and wrote that portion of these limitations, protections, and immunities into the Constitution which relate to the freedom of speech, which give immunity to a Member for speech or debate on the floor, refused to provide punishment for assault upon Members of the House by citizens outside of the House. They knew what every Member of this House may well know, that if this House assumes to convert itself into a police court to decide cases of assault and battery every time a Member of this House is assaulted for words uttered in debate we may at some time become a cheap police court, without dignity, privilege, or respect. What Member has not been questioned, who has in late years been a Member of this House, for words uttered in debate and for speech made upon the floor of the House and for votes cast here? Who of you upon either side of this Chamber has not been confronted by citizens and called to account because of a certain speech, because of what was said in a certain debate, or of a certain vote that you cast.

And yet it has not been presumed that we as Members were immune from being questioned elsewhere for words uttered in speech or debate on this floor. Who has not been questioned upon the stump, in public place—who has not been challenged that upon a certain day he said a certain thing and that when he said that he was false to his constituents? All of us have been questioned, almost assaulted, but yet it never entered into the mind of a Member so questioned and assaulted that he had a constitutional immunity from such questioning. The question of immunity relates wholly, therefore, to that immunity that may be pleaded in any formal body as a defense against any action, civil or criminal, that may be brought by anyone against a Member of the House for words uttered in debate, for speech made, for vote cast, for resolution offered, for vote upon a bill or a resolution. Yea, indeed, the Speaker of this House may plead immunity in this case, if this resolution is agreed to, and the committee bringing in the resolution may plead immunity, if the resolution be agreed to, in defense against an action for false imprisonment, if for the remainder of this Congress or this session the respondent should lie in jail, and thereafter bring action for damages against the Sergeant at Arms, the Speaker of the House, and the committee offering the resolution. The Sergeant at Arms may plead immunity in vain, under the warrant of the Speaker, but the Speaker and the committee and every Member who votes for the resolution may plead immunity, and the court will hold that they are immune for anything said or done in here.

Mr. POWERS rose.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I would rather not yield at this time. This very question has been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States. We do not need to go into the musty alcoves of the Library and bring down ancient decisions rendered at an ancient time, when the environment and judgment of men were vastly different from what they are to-day.

In the case of Kilbourn against Thompson, decided in 1880, the Supreme Court held that while the Sergeant at Arms was liable to Kilbourn for imprisoning him on the warrant of the Speaker, that Speaker Kerr and the Members in charge of the resolution could plead their immunity, as they did plead it, and they were discharged from any liability to the complainant, Kilbourn, but Thompson, the Sergeant at Arms, was held liable. We have a construction in that case of clause 6 of Article I, of the Constitution. It means that a Member for any speech or debate upon this floor may not be required to answer in any other place in any formal proceeding. Why was this clause inserted in the Constitution? We got that, with many other provisions, from Great Britain. It came to us from the mother of parliaments, the Parliament of Great Britain. There was an ancient struggle between that Parliament and the Kings of the British Empire. That struggle went through the reign of the Tudor and Stuart Kings. They were constantly at war with Parliament—members questioned elsewhere for what they said and did in Parliament; members fined; members punished; members imprisoned, members sent to the tower for what they said in debate. After the dethronement of the last of the Stuarts the first Parliament of William and Mary enacted that from that day no member of Parliament should be questioned in any court or elsewhere for words uttered in debate or speech made upon the floor of Parliament. And that language has come down to the parliaments that have succeeded since then. It was one of the Articles of the Confederation. It was made the law of many legislative bodies of the Colonies, and when the fathers prepared clause 6 of Article I they provided merely the limitation that a Member could not be questioned elsewhere for any speech or words uttered in debate upon the floor of the House of Representatives, and the Supreme Court of the United States has interpreted that to mean that a man could not be made to answer in court for words so uttered.

Mr. Speaker, the decisions of the privy counsel are contrary to the statement made by the chairman of the committee. In recent years that court has not given support to this ancient assumption of authority by Parliament. In Stockdale against Hansard, rendered in 1843, the privy counsel of Great Britain said that the power of Parliament to punish for contempt was not unlimited. It had assumed up to that time the omnipotent power that Blackstone described in his apostrophe to Parliament, but in the case of Stockdale against Hansard the unlimited authority to punish for contempt was specifically denied.

Now, upon the question as to what we are proceeding to do here: Without a law we are making one after the fact—after the assault in Farragut Square. There is no special punishment fixed by Congress or any other power for making an assault upon a Member of Congress, so we are passing a special law to cover that omission, not only of the Constitution, but of the Congress itself. We have power to legislate for the District and have legislated. We have covered cases of assaults. We have provided in the case of assaults in the District of Columbia as follows:

> Whoever unlawfully assaults or threatens another in a menacing manner shall be fined not more than $500 or be imprisoned not more than 12 months, or both.

So we are not without a law. We have made this law for any man who may chance to be within the confines of this District, for the protection of all, for the punishment of all. We did not say, "This law applies in all cases except in the case of an assault upon a Member of Congress." If we had said so, the law would have been unconstitutional. We have never undertaken to define it as a special offense against the law of this land to commit an assault upon the President of the United States, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, any Senator or any Member of the House. We could not do that if we would by the joint action of the Members of both branches of Congress and the approval of the President, and much less are we able to do so by adopting this resolution. We are attempting by the adoption of this resolution to do what the Congress of the United States with the consent of the President could not do—make it a special offense to commit an assault upon a Member of Congress out of the presence of Congress.

Why, the matter was considered——

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I would rather not yield.

Twelve years ago many bills were introduced in the House and in the Senate to make it an especial crime to assault or assassinate the President of the United States or the Vice President or anyone succeeding to that high office. The question was discussed in both ends of the Capitol. It was discussed from the pulpit; it was discussed in the press; it was discussed everywhere throughout the country; but, after mature deliberation, Congress in both of its branches came to the conclusion that it was not wise to single out even the President of the United States, or any man who might rightfully succeed to that high office, and give him the special protection of a special law, making it a special crime to commit an assault upon his person. Evidently Congress remembered that provision of our ancient guaranty of equal protection that has surrounded the citizens of this Republic from the day of its foundation, which grants to everyone the equal protection of the law and gives no one special protection.

Now, Mr. Speaker, speaking of the power of Congress to proceed without limitation, of the power to punish for contempt, the Supreme Court of the United States in Kilbourn vs. Thompson has followed the judgments of the recent decisions of the privy council. The ancient traditions that preceded and immediately followed the dictum of Lord Ellenborough, in Burdette against Abbott, in 1811, are no longer followed. We do not go to that remote past for authority for our action in matters to-day.

The world has been making some progress since then toward the equality of man and the right of every citizen to the equal protection of the law, denying also the right of the exercise of more than the authorized powers by any branch of the Government—we, the Legislature; yonder the Supreme Court, and yonder the Executive. We have our functions to perform and they are not judicial.

The case of Burdette against Abbott, decided by Lord Ellenborough in 1811, took the position, as stated by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS], that Parliament had the inherent power, of necessity, to proceed without limitation in the matter of punishment for contempt of its dignity or authority. This case was followed by Justice Baron Parke, in 1836, in the case of Beaumont against Barrett. He followed the dictum of Lord Ellenborough in the Burdette case, and held:

The power of punishing contempts is inherent in every assembly possessing a supreme legislative authority, whether they are such as tend indirectly to obstruct their proceedings or directly to bring their authority into contempt.

In 1842 the case of Kielley against Carson was tried in the privy council, and the decision was rendered by the same eminent jurist. The case of Kielley against Carson was twice argued, and the last time before one of the greatest arrays of legal talent Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence has ever known at the same time. After the last argument Mr. Justice Baron Parke reversed the decision in Beaumont against Barrett and said that that latter decision was rendered upon the dictum of Lord Ellenborough, and that the case was decided immediately after the conclusion of the argument, and that it was not well considered, and then proceeded to analyze the rights of legislative bodies to try men charged for offenses committed outside of their presence after the fact. It will be interesting, therefore, to know some of the things that that eminent jurist gave utterance to upon this very vital question. He said, among other things:

But the power of punishing anyone for past misconduct as a contempt of its authority and adjudicating upon the fact of such contempt and the measure of punishment as a judicial body irresponsible to the party accused, whatever the real facts may be, is of a very different character and by no means essentially necessary for the exercise of its functions by a local legislature, whether representative or not.

The case of Kielley against Carson was a case of an assault upon a member by the name of Kent, of the Newfoundland Legislature, similar to the assault in this case. Kielley was punished: he was imprisoned; and brought his action against Carson, the sergeant at arms. The case was tried. The highest court in Newfoundland found against Kielley. The case was appealed to the privy council and was argued and reargued, as I have stated, and after exhaustive arguments the opinion held that the inherent right—the constitutional power—of punishing after the fact did not inhere in a legislative body.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit a question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. Is it not a fact that that case was decided with reference to the power to punish, the legislature being that of the Province of Newfoundland?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes; it was the supreme legislative body of Newfoundland.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. And is it not a fact that it differentiated in that particular from legislative bodies in general?

Mr. CAMPBELL. The court merely differentiated that legislative body from the British Parliament and not from legislative bodies in general. It simply said it was not like the British Parliament, which anciently had the authority to punish for contempt, which, under the lex et consuetudo parliamenti, exercised the power to punish for contempt. The opinion proceeds:

All these functions may well be performed without this extraordinary power—and with the aid of the ordinary tribunals to investigate and punish contemptuous insults and interruptions.

That is, referring to the legislative functions—

We have had paraded here to-day all sorts of possible invasions upon the privileges of Congress; we have had Congress threatened with invasion from this quarter and that, destroying the liberty, the conscience, the right of the Members to speak without interruption, without fear, if you please. It was argued, therefore, that the power of punishing for contempt is necessary for our own preservation. The fact that we have the protection of the courts that we ourselves have created has been ignored. We have the protection of the laws that we ourselves have made. If they are sufficient for the rest of mankind, they should be good enough for us. If they are not sufficient, it is within our power to amend them and to add the necessary additional protection.

Mr. Justice Baron Parke, continuing his opinion in Kielley against Carson, said:

It is said, however, that this power belongs to the House of Commons in England; and this, it is contended, confers authority for holding that it belongs as a legal incident, by the common law, to an assembly with analogous functions. But the reason why the House of Commons has this power is not because it is a representative body with legislative functions, but by virtue of ancient usage and prescription; the lex et consuetudo parliamenti, which forms a part of the common law of the land, and according to which the high court of Parliament, before its division, and the Houses of Lords and Commons since, are invested with many peculiar privileges, that of punishing for contempt being one.

Construing this question, he said in that case:

There is no decision of a court of justice nor other authority in favor of the right, except that of the case of Beaumont v. Barrett (1 Moo. P. C., 59), decided by the judicial committee, the members present being Lord Brougham, Mr. Justice Bosanquet, Mr. Justice Erskine, and myself. Their lordships do not consider that case as one by which they ought to be bound on deciding the present question. The opinion of their lordships, delivered by myself, immediately after the argument was closed, though it clearly expressed that the power was incidental to every legislative assembly, was not the only ground on which that judgment was rested, and therefore was in some degree extrajudicial; but, besides, it was stated to be and was founded entirely on the dictum of Lord Ellenborough in Burdette v Abbott (14 East, 137), which dictum we all think can not be taken as an authority for the abstract proposition that every legislative body has the power of committing for contempt. The observation was made by his lordship with reference to the peculiar powers of Parliament, and ought not, we all think, to be extended any further.

We all therefore think that the opinion expressed by myself in the case of Beaumont v. Barrett (1 Moo. P. C., 59) ought not to affect our decision in the present case, and there being no other authority on the subject, we decide according to the principle of the common law, that the house of assembly have not the power contended for. They are a local legislature, with every power reasonably necessary for the proper exercise of their functions and duties, but they have not what they have erroneously supposed themselves to possess—the same exclusive privileges which the ancient law of England has annexed to the House of Parliament.

Do we possess an inherited power of trying a lawsuit in this body? Whence the authority? It was not granted by the Constitution, nor yet by the people. These are grants that were withheld from us. They belong yet to the people.

The question, however, of authority to punish for contempt has been elaborately argued by Mr. Justice Miller in the case of Kilbourn against Thompson, and I beg to take issue with the distinguished gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] in his conclusion as to the authority of that case upon this important question. The decision, the burden of the decision, is upon the authority of Congress as a Congress to try judicial questions. After commenting upon the case of Anderson against Dunn, which in specific language this decision modifies if, indeed, it does not reverse, it says:

We must therefore hold, notwithstanding what is said in the case of Anderson v. Dunn, that the resolution of the House of Representatives finding Kilbourn guilty of contempt and the warrant of its Speaker for his commitment to prison are not conclusive in this case, and the facts are no justification, because, as the whole plea shows, the House was without authority in the matter.

The powers of Congress itself, when acting through the concurrence of both branches, are dependent solely on the Constitution. Such as are not conferred by that instrument, either expressly or by fair implication from what is granted, are "reserved to the States respectively, or to the people." Of course, neither branch of Congress, when acting separately, can lawfully exercise more power than is conferred by the Constitution on the whole body, except in the few instances where authority is conferred on either House separately, as in the case of impeachments. No general power of inflicting punishment by the Congress of the United States is found in that instrument. It contains in the provision that no "person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law," the strongest implication against punishment by order of the legislative body. It has been repeatedly decided by this court, and by others of the highest authority, that this means a trial in which the rights of the party shall be decided by a tribunal appointed by law, which tribunal is to be governed by rules of law previously established.

What law has been "previously established" for the government of the judicial body that you propose to create by this resolution? None. You will prescribe that after you have converted this body into a police court.

Continuing the court said:

An act of Congress which proposed to adjudge a man guilty of a crime and inflict the punishment would be conceded by all thinking men to be unauthorized by anything in the Constitution. That instrument, however, is not wholly silent as to the authority of the separate branches of Congress to inflict punishment. It authorizes each House to punish its own members. By the second clause of the fifth section of the first article, "Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings."

This case modified the dictum in the case of Anderson against Dunn, following the dictum of Lord Ellenborough in Burdette against Abbott. The case of Kilbourn against Thompson has not been modified by any decision since.

The general trend of public thought, the general trend of the world's great political movements, has been in the opposite direction from the power contended for in this resolution. It has been toward the taking away of assumed authority. It has been toward the taking away of assumed dignity. It has been toward the elevation of the citizen, rather than the granting of power for his degradation. Every movement in the last quarter of a century, and especially in the last decade, has been against the assumption of unusual authority that would lead to the infliction of unusual punishments upon any citizen for any cause.

The authority that we are assuming to exercise here to-day is the ancient authority of the Parliament of Great Britain. Is there a man here who will go back a century of time and plead before any forum in this Republic the practices and the traditions of the British Empire a century ago for his action here to-day? And yet that is exactly what you are doing in proposing the adoption of this resolution, making this body—a purely legislative body, one branch only of the Congress of the United States—a body with unlimited judicial power in a given case, granted by the House to itself without the warrant or authority of the Constitution.

I challenge any man upon this floor or elsewhere to point to a single provision of the Constitution that grants the authority that we are exercising here to-day of inflicting punishment upon a citizen for an offense committed outside of the presence of the House upon one of its Members.

Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CLAYTON). The gentleman has eight minutes remaining.

Mr. CAMPBELL. We may pause at this point to see just how much too far we are pressing our authority, how much too far we are asserting our dignity, how much above the rest of mankind we are elevating ourselves, how much we claim for ourselves that we deny to other men. Anciently the Parliament of Great Britain claimed many privileges and immunities that were denied to other citizens. But the time has passed even in Great Britain when the ancient privileges and immunities and powers of Parliament are conceded by the people. I have here a book that I have had in my library for many years—The Mother of Parliaments. I find this:

The jealous care with which Parliament guarded its rights in olden days often threatened to bring the very name of privilege into contempt. The Commons especially acquired the pernicious habit of voting that whatsoever displeased them was an insult to Parliament—requiring instant and drastic punishment. Books or sermons which criticized or reflected upon the doings of either House were condemned wholesale, confiscated, and publicly burnt by the common hangman; authors or preachers were imprisoned and otherwise penalized. "The Parliament men are as great princes as any in the world," says Selden, "when whatsoever they please is privilege of Parliament; no man must know the number of their privileges, and whatsoever they dislike is breach of privilege."

That is what we are doing here—

How is it to-day? Stockdale against Hansard decided that there are limitations to the powers and the privileges of Parliament. It may not imprison a man for contempt of its authority in all cases, as of old, and its public printer must respond in damages for publishing a defamatory article even when published by order of Parliament.

Further, from the Mother of Parliaments:

Impeachment, imprisonment, fines, confiscation of property, or committal to the Tower were among the penalties meted out with a lavish hand to all who gave offense to the Commons.

The most trivial faults, the most innocent acts were, from time to time, contempts of Parliament, and the offenders chastised with a barbarity which was out of all proportion to the nature of their misdeeds. So harmless an offense as crowding or jostling against a member of Parliament was at one time considered a crime.

Mr. Speaker, we are not so much above the rest of mankind after all. We are here in a representative capacity and bring a limited authority from the people with us.

I listened this morning to the solemn oath administered to a Member of this House. He declared in the presence of all mankind and Almighty God that he would support the Constitution of the United States; and yet within to-day's session he is asked to overstep that Constitution and convert one branch of Congress into a judicial body—convert it into a trial court to try a question after the fact touching the guilt or innocence of a private citizen.

Mr. Jefferson—and I shall conclude with that great authority—appealed to the Congress of the United States to restrain itself upon this very question. After marshaling the claims for inherent right and of necessity to punish for breach of privileges or dignity, together with the contentions against the exercise of that power, Mr. Jefferson says in his Manual:

But if one branch may assume its own privileges without control, if it may do it on the spur of the occasion, conceal the law in its own breast, and, after the fact committed, make its sentence both the law and the judgment on that fact; if the offense is to be kept undefined and to be declared only ex re nata, and according to the passions of the moment, and there be no limitation either in the manner or measure of the punishment, the condition of the citizen will be perilous indeed.

Perhaps Congress in the meantime, in their care for the safety of the citizen, as well as that for their own protection, may declare by law what is necessary and proper to enable them to carry into execution the powers vested in them, and thereby hang up a rule for the inspection of all, which may direct the conduct of the citizen, and at the same time test the judgments they shall themselves pronounce in their own case.

We have not defined either by rule or law the power we are asked to assume to-day, and until we have done this it ill becomes this great parliament of a free people to exercise such a power.

My brethren, we must protect the privileges, dignity, and authority of this House. We can do so in no better way than by not inviting the contempt of the public upon the privileges, dignity, and authority of this great body by assuming power beyond the limitations of the Constitution, to punish a citizen for an offense that is unknown to the law of the land. [Applause.]

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I yield 40 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COVINGTON].

[Mr. COVINGTON addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PROUTY].

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. Speaker, we are here at this time to consider and determine, if we may, a grave and important question. It is not a question whether or not the controversy between Mr. SIMS and Mr. Glover created a sufficient cause or provocation on the part of Mr. Glover to make an assault. We are not to discuss or determine the question as to whether or not the things said of and concerning Mr. Glover by Mr. SIMS are true or false. We are here to settle and determine, if we can, the great question as to whether or not under the Constitution of the United States this body is clothed with power to protect itself against contempt, whether it has power to punish those that undertake to transgress the high privileges of this branch of Congress.

At the very inception of the investigation on the part of the committee we notified Mr. Glover of our desire to have his presence and such testimony as he saw fit to offer, and in response to our request he communicated to us by letter, in which he says:

The preamble of the resolution sets forth with substantial accuracy the facts of the incidents therein referred to.

In that resolution it was alleged and set out that Mr. Glover had made an attack upon Mr. SIMS for and on account of words spoken by Mr. SIMS upon the floor of this House. After having admitted these two fundamental facts, namely, that the assault had been made and that it had been made expressly on account of words spoken in this House, Mr. Glover proceeds to challenge in a courteous way the power and jurisdiction of this House to punish him for this act. He says:

Though advised that under any fair and reasonable interpretation of the conclusions announced by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Kilbourn v. Thompson (103 U. S., 168) the House of Representatives is without jurisdiction to pursue this inquiry and to take the action foreshadowed by the resolution in question, I have determined, as the result of personal reflection, to disregard this advice for the moment, reserving, however, the right to avail myself of the benefits thereof if it should at any time become necessary so to do.

Confronted by that frank statement, this committee gave its careful, considerate, and I might say judicial, consideration to the grave and important question as to whether or not there is under the nature of our Constitution power vested in the House of Representatives as a whole to protect itself and its Members from assault. In the consideration of that question it was somewhat assigned to me to review and examine carefully the judicial decisions on this question. I shall confine myself in the discussion that I make to the one single constitutional question as to whether or not there is inherent power as determined by the courts of the United States lodged in this body to punish for contempt.

It is conceded by everybody, it is conceded by every court that has passed upon this question, that there is no express power in the Constitution given the House of Representatives to punish for contempt. I might say that it is conceded by everybody who has examined the question that there is in the Constitution no express power giving to the courts jurisdiction to punish for contempt of their authority.

It has been held, however, in every court of the land that has ever considered this question, in England and in this country, in State and Federal courts, that courts have the implied power—a power that grows out of their very office, grows out of the dignity of their jurisdiction—to determine and punish for contempt of the court.

Now, the clear-cut question is this: Has Congress, one of the coordinate branches of this Government, the same implied and necessary power to protect itself?

The first time that this question ever came before the Supreme Court of the United States was in the case of Anderson against Dunn. That case was one in which a certain person had offered a bribe to a Member of Congress. When the matter was brought before the House the same question was raised then that is raised now, and while entertaining the profoundest respect for the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], who argued the question here on the other side to-day, I feel that I am expressing no discourtesy when I say that gentlemen at that time expressed every argument that he has expressed, and I perhaps would not be going too far in saying that they expressed them with much greater cogency, clearness, and accuracy than did the gentleman from Kansas, who argued that side of the controversy. Notwithstanding the able arguments and all the arguments that are offered here to-day, the House by an overwhelming majority, as I remember, 4 to 1, decided the proposition that they had the power to punish for contempt, although it will be noted the contempt was not committed in the presence of the House.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. Speaker, just let me inquire if there is any time on the other side of the House that I can have, if I yield at this time.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. How much time does the gentleman want in addition?

Mr. PROUTY. I can not tell, until I see how much time these other things take.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. I think I can yield the gentleman some time.

Mr. PROUTY. Then, Mr. Speaker, I yield.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman from Iowa say that the House acts judicially when it votes on a resolution of this kind?

Mr. PROUTY. Not exactly judicially. I have not said that. The courts act judicially in protecting their power, and this body acts in accordance with its power and not as a judicial body. It acts as one of the great sovereign, independent departments of this Government in exercising those rights that are necessary for its preservation, and not the preservation of the courts.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. PROUTY. Certainly.

Mr. CAMPBELL. And in passing upon a judicial question, a question of fact and a question of law, does it not become necessary for the House to act in a judicial capacity?

Mr. PROUTY. In a sense, in a judicial capacity, of course. Nobody can determine a question of fact unless he determines it at least with a judicial mind.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The gentleman cited the vote in the House of Representatives on resolutions of this kind as a precedent or as an authority for acting upon these resolutions.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman will pardon me, but I did not yield for an argument. This is what I said, and I will repeat it, that this House in that case decided that it had the power. I did not say it was a judicial opinion from which an appeal might be taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, but I do say that the House in a clearly defined and in a better argued case than has been argued here to-day on either side—that is generous enough I am sure—after argument decided that it had the power. That case was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, the case of Anderson against Dunn, and there every argument was presented to the Supreme Court that has been presented by my good friend here to-day, and after full and complete discussion, every phase that has been suggested here by my friend was gone into and repudiated and refuted by the learned judge who wrote that opinion. I will not read the case in full, but here is what the court says:

It is certainly true that there is no power given by the Constitution to either House to punish for contempt except when committed by their own Members, nor does the judicial nor criminal power given to the United States in part expressly extend to the infliction of punishment for contempt of either House or any coordinate branch of the Government. Shall we, therefore, decide that no such power exists? It is true that such a power, if it exists, must be derived from implication, and the genius and spirit of our institutions are hostile to the exercise of implied powers. Had the faculties of man been competent to the framing of a system of government which would have left nothing to implication, it can not be doubted that the effort would have been made by the framers of the Constitution. But what is the fact? There is not in the whole of that admirable instrument a grant of powers which does not draw after it others not expressed, but vital to their exercise; not substantive and independent, indeed, but auxiliary and subordinate.

But if there is one maxim which necessarily rides over all others in the practical application of government, it is that the public functionaries must be left at liberty to exercise the power which the people have intrusted to them. The interest and dignity of those who created them require the exertion of the powers indispensable to the attainment ends of their creation. No reason can be urged against the exercise of such power. The wretch beneath the gallows may repine at the fate which awaits him, and yet it is no less certain that the laws under which he suffers were made for his security.

The unreasonable murmurs of individuals against the restraints of society have a direct tendency to produce that worst of all despotisms which makes every individual the tyrant over his neighbor's rights. "The safety of the people is the supreme law" not only comports with but is indispensable to the exercise of those powers in their public functionaries, without which that safety can not be guarded. On this principle it is that courts of justice are universally acknowledged to be vested, by their very creation, with power to impose silence, respect, and decorum in their presence and submission to their lawful mandates, and, as a corollary to this proposition, to preserve themselves and their officers from the approach and insults of pollution. It is true that the courts of justice of the United States are vested, by express statute provision, with power to fine and imprison for contempt; but it does not follow, from this circumstance, that they would not have exercised that power without the aid of the statute or not in cases, if such should occur, to which such statute provision may not extend. On the contrary, it is a legislative assertion of this right as incidental to a grant of judicial power, and can only be considered either as an instance of abundant caution or a legislative declaration that the power of punishing for contempt shall not extend beyond its known and acknowledged limit of fine and imprisonment.

Now, I call the special attention of the gentleman from Kansas to this:

But it is contended that if this power in the House of Representatives is to be asserted on the plea of necessity, the ground is too broad and the result too indefinite; that the Executive and every coordinate, and even subordinate, branch of the Government may resort to the same justification, and the whole assume to themselves in the exercise of this power the most tyrannical licentiousness.

This is unquestionably an evil to be guarded against, and if the doctrine may be pushed to that extent it must be a bad doctrine and is justly denounced.

But what is the alternative? The argument obviously leads to the total annihilation of the power of the House of Representatives to guard itself from contempts and leaves it exposed to every indignity and interruption that rudeness, caprice, or even conspiracy, may meditate against it. This result is fraught with too much absurdity not to bring into doubt the soundness of any argument from which it is derived. That a deliberative assembly, clothed with the majesty of the people and charged with the care of all that is dear to them, composed of the most distinguished citizens, selected and drawn together from every quarter of the great Nation, whose deliberations are required by public opinion to be conducted under the eye of the public and whose decisions must be clothed with all that sanctity which unlimited confidence in their wisdom and purity can inspire—that such an assembly should not possess the power to suppress rudeness or repel insults is a supposition too wild to be suggested.

That decision has been in the books of the United States Supreme Court for something over half a century. It is found in Sixth Wheaton, page 228. There is only one case that seems to call in question the doctrine clearly announced and laid down in this case, and that is the case of Kilbourn against Thompson, referred to by Mr. Glover in his letter and referred to here by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL]. Now, to read that case casually, as I fear my friend has, one would reach the conclusion that it had overruled the fundamental principle announced by the Supreme Court in the case of Anderson against Dunn. But if he will take the pains to read that case carefully, and reread it, as I have many times, he will find that, while the court does indulge in much dictum that is not in accordance with the line of argument in the Anderson case, yet, when it finally comes up to the question, it then frankly says they do not pass upon the question. I read a small section from the case of Kilbourn against Thompson, found in One hundred and third United States Reports, on page 189, the same case which was called to your attention by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL]. Now, after having spent four or five pages discussing the question we have been discussing here to-day, the court says as follows:

We are of opinion that the right of the House of Representatives to punish the citizen for a contempt of its authority or a breach of its privileges can derive no support from the precedents and practices of the two Houses of the English Parliament, nor from the adjudged cases in which the English courts have upheld these practices. Nor, taking what has fallen from the English judges, and especially the later cases, on which we have just commented, is much aid given to the doctrine that this power exists as one necessary to enable either House of Congress to exercise successfully their function of legislation.

This latter proposition is one which we do not propose to decide in the present case, because we are able to decide it without passing upon the existence or nonexistence of such a power in aid of the legislative function.

The court goes ahead and discusses the express powers of the Constitution as to Congress, and winds up with this statement:

Whether the power of punishment in either House by fine or imprisonment goes beyond this or not, we are sure that no person can be punished for contumacy as a witness before either House, unless his testimony is required in a matter into which that House has jurisdiction to inquire, and we feel equally sure that neither of these bodies possesses the general power of making inquiry into the private affairs of the citizen.

That was the point upon which that case was decided. As has been called to your attention by my colleagues, that was a case where the witness had refused to answer a question as to his private business, and the Supreme Court held that if it was a case where Congress undertook to inquire into private business, that was beyond the power of Congress, because such a right of privacy was protected by another provision of the Constitution.

But I assert now without fear of contradiction that there has never dropped from the pen of any judge, either in the Supreme Court or district court or in any State court of the United States the proposition for which my friend is contending, namely, that Congress has no inherent power to punish for contempt. These two cases have been referred to only once since, and that was in the case of Re Chapman, in which the court especially calls attention to the fact that in this Kilbourn case the question that they decided was the one that I have just now announced, namely, that Congress has no power to punish for contempt a man who refuses to answer a question that Congress has no right to ask him. And in that same opinion, as has been called to your attention in two separate places, the Supreme Court of the United States said that there is no question but that the Congress of the United States has the power to punish for contempt. That was the case where they tested the constitutionality of a law to punish for contempt. As I said, that is the last time that it has appeared in the court, so far as the Supreme Court is concerned. It has appeared, however, once since that in the Court of Appeals in the District of Columbia, in which it was clearly and unequivocally asserted that that was an inherent power vested in Congress, and it could not, even if it desired, divest itself of that authority.

Now, as I intimated in my remarks at the start, this is not a new question, and that every phase that has been here discussed has been discussed by Congress before. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] made as the basis of his argument the proposition that a crime could not be punished until it was first defined and its punishment provided for. In other words, that we must create a crime by law.

I think, if the gentleman will reflect a minute, he will detect the absurdity of that proposition. There never has been any law, to my knowledge, in any State or in the United States defining just what contempt is. From the very nature of the thing, it is impossible. It may grow up in so many and so diversified situations and conditions that you could not possibly anticipate it by legislation. No court has ever undertaken to define and set down rules for its determination. Suppose, to illustrate what I mean, a man would walk up to a judge on the bench and spit in his face. Then the fellow would employ my good friend from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] to defend him; and he would look through his statute books and would say: "I do not find anything in the statute books about spitting in a judge's face. Therefore he must go free, because no law has been made to meet such a case or punishment provided." This Congress had that proposition up once. It was once undertaken, and after an exhaustive discussion and consideration of the question they found it was impossible in the statute to define contempt. Contempt is anything that strikes at the authority or power or dignity or freedom of the tribunal, and it may be exercised by all the varied acts that human ingenuity can meditate or think about.

Now, the next thing the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] says is that he ought to be tried by a jury; that under our great free institutions every man is entitled to a trial by jury. Now, the gentleman is too good a lawyer to say that. There never was a contempt case until the recent act of Congress ever tried by a jury. It is one of the powers of the court to determine the facts and prescribe the punishment. It must be so, from the very nature of things.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MOON). Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. PROUTY. With pleasure.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The gentleman concedes that the modern trend of thought led this Congress to pass a law giving the citizen the right of a trial by jury even in a contempt case?

Mr. PROUTY. Not in all contempt cases; only in certain contempt cases where the question of fact was involved.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Certainly.

Mr. PROUTY. But here the facts are admitted. There is no question of fact to be determined here. It is for us to determine the law; and, as I understand my good friend here now, he would have a jury called to determine the question of facts, when Mr. Glover himself admits the facts.

Now, think of that absurdity for a moment. You must sometimes consider what might happen in order to determine the powers that are necessary to prevent it. Suppose that this Congress should pass some law that was so obnoxious to the people in the District of Columbia that they would undertake to mob Congress. Supposing we should pass a law—for instance, an excise law or a law abolishing the half-and-half principle in the District—upon which these people would become so indignant that they would undertake to punish every man who spoke for it or voted for it on the floor of this House. Suppose we marched down here and they jumped on us and pounded us and beat us and assaulted us. My friend would say, "Your only remedy is to go down here to the police court, file an information, and call for a jury composed of the same men, surrounded by the same influences, aroused by the same situation, and call upon them to pass upon the question of the guilt or innocence of the fellows who have committed the assault."

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. PROUTY. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. In what respect would that differ from permitting the man who was assaulted to be the court and jury to try the man who committed the assault?

Mr. PROUTY. As I say, the court does pass upon it. But——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. PROUTY. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] give me some more time?

Mr. MANN. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. PROUTY. Fifteen minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman 15 minutes more.

Mr. PROUTY. Just think for a moment, gentlemen, where the doctrine of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] would lead us to. Under the Constitution a Member of Congress is not to be called to account for any of the things that he says on the floor of this House, and yet under the gentleman's application of that splendid protection that has been thrown around the sacredness of speech here a man attacks the gentleman upon the street for what he has said here, and he has no other right, no other power for his protection than is given to the hobo. The gentleman would simply have the right to file an information for assault and battery, and the humblest negro or the most vagrant hobo in this town has all of that right.

What did the Constitution intend to do when it said that no man should be called on or questioned for what he says upon the floor of this House at any other place? Why, my friend says, "There is ample protection and enforcement of that provision by filing an information in the police court and having the other fellow fined a few dollars."

Why, that is the right and the protection that the humblest citizen has, independent of this Constitution. I would like also to call the attention of the Members of Congress to this point, and it is one that has entered into my mind quite fully: What court, what power, can enforce this provision of the Constitution?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PROUTY. With pleasure.

Mr. CAMPBELL. In what respect would a fine or a term of imprisonment imposed by the courts that we have constituted here in the District differ from either a fine or a term of imprisonment imposed by such a court as we might create out of Congress by the resolution of the House?

Mr. PROUTY. The difference is this: The courts have no power to limit or to gauge the punishment under this constitutional provision. Let us be frank about it. Suppose we were filing an information against a man down here for assaulting the gentleman for a speech made in this House. Suppose the gentleman should say he is a Member of Congress, and that for what he should say as a Member of Congress is not to be questioned in any place, and therefore the courts must determine the amount of punishment that should be meted out to the offender. Its mere statement shows its folly. You could not go into court and plead that proposition. I repeat that if this House has not the power to enforce that constitutional provision, there is nowhere vested in any court any power to enforce it or preserve it.

There is one other thought that I wish to call to the attention of this House. Several times it has been hinted at and intimated that this is a trivial matter that never ought to have been brought to this House—that it ought to have been settled in the police court or settled on the spot. If any of you have taken the pains to read the testimony in this case, you have found that Mr. Glover on more than one occasion said that if it was not for the dueling laws of Congress he would challenge this man to mortal combat. And if it had not been for a law that this Congress saw fit to put upon the statute books many years ago, it is more than probable, from the disposition shown by the respondent in this case, that we would here to-day be considering a case of homicide and not one of simple assault.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Would we have the right to try a case of homicide?

Mr. PROUTY. We would have the right to try a man for dueling, as I interpret the law. Yes; we would have a right to try a man for any insult that he offered to the Members of Congress for things that they said upon the floor. You would say, of course, that notwithstanding he had shot down Mr. SIMS upon the spot for words that he said upon this floor, there is no power in this House to punish him for contempt; and as I have called attention to before, very often, the situation in this town might have been such, there might have been such an inflaming of public sentiment as would have made it impossible to convict Mr. Glover by a jury of his peers, and therefore he would have gone unpunished for committing one of the gravest crimes against the dignity and power of the United States Congress.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. PROUTY. Certainly.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Suppose the President of the United States had signed that law that was so offensive to the people of the District of Columbia, and that they should take their vengeance upon him. Is there any special crime for assassinating the President of the United States?

Mr. PROUTY. No; because there is nothing in the Constitution that says the President shall not be called in question for anything that he says. It is not supposed that the President will do much talking, although that has been violated considerably recently. [Laughter.] Everybody knows that as a fundamental principle of a republican form of government all men who make laws must be at liberty to discuss policies, measures, and men freely, untrammeled, without any fear of being called in question by the slugger upon the streets. [Applause.]

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. MANN. How much time does the gentleman yield back?

Mr. PROUTY. Whatever I have.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MOON). The gentleman yields back nine minutes.

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. NELSON] 20 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Speaker, having served with the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] in this House for a number of years, I, of course, know that he is a very able and astute lawyer; but if he has made good to-day in his constitutional argument he is the ablest constitutional lawyer this country has ever known. This follows because he has challenged—and I presume to his satisfaction has overthrown—the position taken by Chief Justice John Marshall on the implied powers of Congress, and specifically the position taken by him in the Anderson-Dunn case. Marshall was in the consulting room and on the bench when that opinion was passed upon and delivered; and though penned by another, the brain of Marshall molded this decision. Not only that, but the gentleman from Kansas has overthrown Mr. Justice Story, who sat as associate justice in the Anderson case, and who as a commentator on the Constitution strongly argues for the powers which the gentleman from Kansas denies.

As has been shown by my colleagues on the committee, the gentleman from Kansas has challenged an array of legal luminaries on the Constitution. I am going to call attention to one or two only, because my time is limited.

What Judge PROUTY has said is true. The gentleman from Kansas has shrewdly marshaled those arguments that have been put forward by minority committee reports and by attorneys in the cases referred to, but all of them have been overruled in both branches of Congress and by the decisions of the courts. He has not been able to produce a single case that sustains his point of view—not a single great authority on the Constitution.

In the case against Woods, where Mr. Bingham of Ohio, chairman of the Judiciary Committee, brought in the majority report, the House sentenced Mr. Woods to jail for three months because he had assaulted a Member of Congress, although in that case it is not entirely clear that he was assaulted in his official capacity, because the words spoken by him which induced the assault were uttered outside of the House.

Yet these able lawyers reported him guilty, and Mr. Bingham quotes in his argument Kent, Story, and Rowle, three of our most learned commentators on the Constitution, in support of the power of the House to punish an assault made upon a Member of the House as for contempt.

Now, I wish to read an interesting letter by the Attorney General of the United States, which is referred to by Mr. Bingham in the Woods case in 1870, although the letter was written in 1834. It is as follows:

ATTORNEY GENERAL'S OFFICE, June 25, 1834.

SIR: In answer to the question submitted to me on the memorial of Gen. Houston, who appears to have been indicted, convicted, and fined in the criminal court of this District for an assault on the person of a Member from the House of Representatives after having been previously punished by that House, for the same act, as a contempt and breach of privilege, I have the honor to state that, in my opinion, the proceedings of the House constituted no bar to the subsequent indictment and conviction. The fifth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which provides that no person "shall be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb," does not apply to cases of this sort. Courts and other bodies which have the power of punishing for contempts are invested with that power, and are supposed to employ it for the purpose of protecting themselves in the due exercise of their appropriate functions, and not for the purpose of vindicating the general law of the land, which may also have been violated by the same act. Technically, therefore, Gen. Houston has not been twice tried for the same offense. The act committed by him was one and the same, and it constituted but one indictable offense, and he was therefore liable to only one conviction on indictment. But if this act was also a breach of the privileges of the House of Representatives and a contempt of the House, they had a right to punish him for the contempt independently of the action of the criminal court, and so vice versa.

I am, sir, etc.,

B. F. BUTLER.

Then there is the more recent Chapman case, referred to frequently in this debate, which is another decision that is overturned by the great constitutional lawyer from Kansas. Who wrote this opinion? Chief Justice Fuller. Who sat on the bench and in the consulting room with him? Chief Justice, then Associate Justice, White. These jurists also go down before the onslaught of the gentleman from Kansas, for in that case the court directly held that the House "necessarily possesses the inherent power of self-protection," and asserts again and again that neither House of Congress can divest itself of the power to punish for contempt. The Attorney General's opinion just read is cited on the point that the assault constitutes two offenses—one against the House because of the violation of its inherent privileges, and the other against the individual assaulted, of which the courts of law have jurisdiction. Unquestionably, Mr. SIMS can have Mr. Glover prosecuted in the courts. But that is not our primary concern. The House has the constitutional right to protect a Member of this body, so that we do not have to appeal to a police court and be hampered in the discharge of our official duties every time an assault is made upon a Member of the House. Anyone can see plainly the reason why the House of Representatives must have the inherent right to punish for contempt.

But the report of the special committee was made so inclusive, and I believe conclusive, of the facts in the case, the precedents of both branches of Congress, the decisions of the courts, together with the reasons upon which these rest, that it would be wearisome repetition of authorities and arguments to go over them again in detail. I would rather take the time that is left to me to make some observations that may be of service to those who are most vitally concerned in this affair. I think it proper and right that I should express a personal thought, a sentiment, and a hope.

My thought is that up to the present moment the House of Representatives has acted in this case in a way that is entirely worthy of it—in a deliberate and dignified manner, which I am sure has commended itself to the membership of this House, to the people of this District and elsewhere, and will be approved by those who shall come after us when they shall have occasion to refer back to the precedent we are now making. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], with his usual tact and ability, instead of asking for summary action by the House, introduced a resolution calling for the appointment of a special committee to report and investigate, giving the committee authority, and clearly defining its duties. And the Speaker, with his keen sense of the fitness of things and his thorough knowledge of the mental make-up of the older Members of the House, made no mistake in the appointment of the personnel of the committee save for one possible exception. I attribute my appointment to a generous friendship and good will, but it was singularly fortunate that the committee had the services of the former parliamentary expert of this body, Mr. CRISP, of Georgia, who gave the committee the benefit of his extended and reliable knowledge of parliamentary law, procedure, and precedents. We were also fortunate in having on that committee a gentleman who has had long experience on the bench, Mr. PROUTY, of Iowa, who reviewed thoroughly the decisions of the courts, and also such able lawyers, with keen analytical and logical minds, as J. HARRY COVINGTON, of Maryland, and JOHN W. DAVIS, of West Virginia, our chairman. Each member of the committee, feeling his responsibility to this House and his duty with reference to these two gentlemen, Mr. Glover and Mr. SIMS, divested himself of all bias and prejudice and independently made a survey of the entire field. When we came together we found ourselves in substantial agreement upon every proposition, which was fortunate, because it enabled us to make a unanimous report defining the rights of Members, the privileges of the House, and its power to punish for contempt.

I particularly wish to commend in this case the action of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS]. He did not bring this matter to the attention of the House, but when asked to come before the committee he did so and made a full, free, and frank statement of the facts, without any attempt to exaggerate or color them. Indeed, he rather minimized and deprecated the extent of the injury that he had suffered at the hands of Mr. Glover. I commend his course because it shows a high order of moral courage, not merely brute courage. The committee had special opportunity to learn the real facts.

It learned that Mr. Glover had permitted this controversy with Mr. SIMS to prey upon his mind. He had brooded over it, and if he was not beside himself, if he was not insane—I do not say that he was—yet he had permitted this matter to so strain his nervous tension that he had but little check upon his actions. Read the testimony of Mr. SIMS himself. Mr. SIMS is coming along, not thinking of danger. He had no hard feeling toward Mr. Glover. They had indulged in a controversy, as other men have upon this floor; but Members of the House have no lasting ill-will toward each other or toward other men with whom they differ. Suddenly some one, whom he found to be Mr. Glover, accosted him from behind and struck him. What impression did Mr. Glover make upon Mr. SIMS? I will quote passages from Mr. SIMS's testimony:

He had what I believed to be at the time, and so impressed me, an insane expression, a glare of the eyes, somewhat of a bluish pallor on the face.

Again:

He had an expression on his face which made me feel very apprehensive at the moment.

Again:

Because by that time I felt very apprehensive of an assault, but not an ordinary assault with the hand.

Again:

I was only watching his right hand and his right arm, with the only purpose which I arrived at coolly and deliberately, that if I saw his hand go toward his coat pocket or his trousers pocket to grab his arm. I had no other thought.

Again:

To be perfectly candid and clear about this matter, it was a very light stroke; and having come to the conclusion that I had come to, from his appearance, I regarded it as a provocative stroke, and I purposely and deliberately, for what I thought was my own best interest, declined to strike back or do anything that would justify an assault of the kind I felt from his appearance was intended.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NELSON. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. Did the committee come to any conclusion as to whether or not Mr. Glover was sane or insane at the time of this assault?

Mr. NELSON. No.

Mr. GOOD. If I understood the gentleman correctly, he is reading from the testimony to show that Mr. Glover had brooded over this matter to such an extent that he was deranged.

Mr. NELSON. I have given the gentleman my theory of his mental attitude. This is what Mr. SIMS testified was the impression that Mr. Glover made upon him.

Mr. GOOD. That is what I was trying to get at. The gentleman's conclusion was that he was rather unbalanced in mind at that time.

Mr. NELSON. I said I would not say that, but that he had reached a state of nervous tension where he had but little check on his own action.

Mr. GOOD. If that is the case, does the gentleman think this is a tribunal to try an insane man?

Mr. NELSON. I did not say he was insane. The gentleman is putting a forced construction on what I said.

Mr. GOOD. Does the gentleman think this is a tribunal to try a man whose mind is unbalanced by reason of his brooding upon a subject at any time?

Mr. NELSON. That is not an issue here, and that is not a matter of defense, and I decline to yield further.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. He is not pleading insanity. All men are presumed to be sane.

Mr. NELSON. What was in Mr. Glover's mind? The testimony of Hon. BEN JOHNSON shows that months previously he had expressed regret that there was a law against dueling. But for this law he would have challenged Mr. SIMS. For what purpose? Obviously he wished either to wound or to kill Mr. SIMS. And others have heard the same remark. In fact, within the personal knowledge of members of the committee he uttered the same words. It is also in the testimony that he said to a newspaper man that he was on the lookout for Mr. SIMS. Now, all I desire to bring out is that if Mr. SIMS had not acted with a high degree of moral courage and self-control—for he has those passions we all have—instead of the comedy that caused the man up the tree to laugh, a tragedy might have been enacted in Farragut Square. I have served with Mr. SIMS in this body for seven years. I have never known a more fearless fighter on the side of public welfare on every question than he. When I first came here Mr. SIMS was on the District Committee. He very soon won my confidence, because he frequently demonstrated that he possessed the moral courage to resist all forms of special and selfish interests of gentlemen in the city of Washington who had legislative schemes to put through, and courageously exposed them on this floor.

Mr. SIMS is entitled to the praise of his colleagues and the approval of his constituents for his self-control. Had he repelled the assault with a counterblow it might have given him some personal satisfaction but little honor, for it would have been reported in the newspapers and said throughout the country: "There is another Member of Congress, one of those fire eaters of the South, who has so far forgotten the dignity of his high office as to engage in a brawl with a citizen in a public place." The House would have hesitated to order an investigation in that event, because it would not have cared to wash dirty linen in public.

I want to say a word now for Mr. Glover in this matter. Mr. Glover is a man of high standing socially and financially in this city. Undoubtedly this controversy between him and Mr. SIMS had worked upon his mind. He felt that his reputation among his fellow citizens had been injured. Deeply resentful, he forgot himself and took the law in his own hands. But he has frankly avowed his fault. He has stated that he never intended to infringe upon the privileges of this House nor hold it in contempt. I believe, therefore, that when the time comes for us to pass sentence upon him we should not play the part of a Shylock and insist upon the full pound of flesh, but rather let the quality of mercy season our justice, for mercy gives justice a flavor that is pleasing to man and to his Maker. I hope the House will adopt this resolution, approving thereby the findings of the committee upon the rights of Members, the privileges of the House, and the power of the House to punish for contempt. If we adopt this resolution by a nearly unanimous vote, it will stand as a landmark for all time to come in our parliamentary and constitutional history. Let the Sergeant at Arms arrest Mr. Glover, let him be reprimanded by the Speaker, and then be discharged from custody. The House will thus conclude what it has begun in the right spirit. Vindictiveness will have had no part in its action. Its course will have been dictated alone by the patriotic purpose to maintain the rights of Members, and to protect the power, the dignity, the safety, and the integrity of the proceedings of the House of Representatives of the American people, in discharging its constitutional duties.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. NELSON. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin think that a reprimand from the House of Representatives is more of a deterrent to citizens in the future from an assault upon the Members of Congress than a possible fine of $500 and languishing in the jail of the District of Columbia for a year, as the courts we have constituted are authorized to impose for assault?

Mr. NELSON. Answering the gentleman, I believe the present situation lends itself admirably to serving notice upon Mr. Glover, and every other person in this District, that under the Constitution we have the power and shall always reserve the right to send any person to prison or to reprimand him, no matter how high he may stand socially and financially, when the privileges of the House have been invaded. The Member assaulted still has the right to go to the courts if he desires to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. I yield the gentleman 10 minutes additional.

Mr. NELSON. As an individual citizen Mr. SIMS has the right to go to the courts of law, if he cares to do so, but the House is protecting him as an integral part of this body, and always will protect its Members when assaulted, harassed, or insulted in their official capacity, but as individuals they can also go to the courts of law for further redress.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman, in reference to this constitutional provision that a Member shall not be questioned for any speech or debate in any other place. Would you say that a speech that is made on the floor of this House could not be questioned at home, in the newspapers, or in the magazines?

Mr. NELSON. Not at all. The people have the right to question, in the sense of criticizing, provided that this does not directly interfere with the constitutional duty that you and I are here to discharge. Where there is something done that affects the integrity or the safety or the orderly discharge of our duties here, then the House has the right to act and to punish. An assault may keep a Member away from the House and may intimidate him, especially in a case like this, as Mr. Glover is still interested in park projects which will come before us; and if he or any other person may slap a Member in the face every time such private citizen disagrees with or is resentful of words spoken in debate, we shall not be safe in passing to and from this House or in the discharge of our public trust.

Mr. DILLON. The offense here is for words spoken in this House. That is the conclusion of the committee.

Mr. NELSON. Yes; that is the constitutional right we have.

Mr. DILLON. Suppose Mr. Glover in meeting Mr. SIMS had taken him to task for words spoken in this House and had done so in a manner that is a provocation, and then Mr. SIMS had defended himself, would you still contend that we can punish the attack, or take him to task for words spoken in this House?

Mr. NELSON. Answering the gentleman generally, he can make his own application. When the thing done clearly touches a Member in his official capacity then the House will take notice. If he gets into a brawl as to whether Walter Johnson is the best baseball pitcher, or some other fellow, then the House will not look into it. Whether the Member is assaulted in his official capacity or not must be determined in each particular case by the facts. Our select committee went into this question, and every other committee will do likewise. The committee will carefully consider whether or not the assault was made on the Member in his official capacity, a direct violation of his constitutional privilege, or not, and so report to the House. But if a Member engages in some common brawl, of course the House will not take notice.

Mr. DILLON. One other question. The gist of this offense constitutes the words spoken in this House and taking to task for the same. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. NELSON. That is the present case.

Mr. DILLON. I want to get instructed on this. It is an interesting question. Suppose that Mr. Glover had accosted the Member upon the street and said to him, "You have spoken these words in the House, and I call you a liar for what you have said, and I will burn your house down in order to get even with you." Now, the offense would not be the burning of the house, would it, but the offense would be taking him to task for what was said in the House of Congress?

Mr. NELSON. The gentleman, of course, can state cases so near the margin that it is difficult to determine whether it would be one or the other.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Let me suggest to the gentleman that this is not a hypothetical case. Here you have the specific charges and a plea of guilty.

Mr. DILLON. What I wanted to be instructed upon is that it is conceded there is no limitation to this punishment.

Mr. NELSON. Indeed there is. In the Anderson case the Supreme Court says it is limited to the life of the Congress.

Mr. DILLON. Suppose it is the last day of Congress and you could not punish? It seems to me the power must be continuous.

Mr. NELSON. I give the Supreme Court decision, and the gentleman having been a distinguished jurist himself can figure it out for himself.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman a question before he takes his seat. I understood the gentleman from West Virginia to make the statement, but if he did not actually state it, it was subject to the deduction that a contempt might be committed by the publisher of a newspaper, commenting upon language spoken on the floor of the House by a Member, in a way that would be offensive, and it might constitute a contempt of the House. I would like to ask the gentleman if that is the opinion of the committee and that a newspaper publisher might be brought before this House and punished for contempt under such circumstances?

Mr. NELSON. I will answer the gentleman that such a case was passed upon by the Senate in the Duane case, where a newspaper man libeled the Senate, clearly slandered the Senate, where he was cited to appear, and was finally punished by the courts themselves.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Was it a libel of a Senator or of the Senate as a whole?

Mr. NELSON. The Senate as a whole. Of course there is a distinction here. It must go to the very integrity, safety, and dignity of the House. A mere criticism by newspapers generally would not be considered. The House itself and the Speaker have decided that mere criticism by newspapers generally is not entitled to serious consideration, but anything which puts Members and Senators in the light of being criminals, grafters, of accepting bribes, or doing that through which Congress would lose the respect of the people, allows the House and both branches of Congress to order an investigation, and if the charges are found to be grossly untrue and libelous to punish the detractors.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. NELSON. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. If the gentleman will permit me, I understood the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] to quote my position to the effect that a libel on the House would be considered a breach of its privileges. That, perhaps, is a deduction from what I said, but it is not my language. My language, if the gentleman will permit, is that the phrase "questioned as to words spoken in debate" refers to questioning not only in a court of justice and not only questioning by a personal attack, but it may even include a questioning by words, and that is shown to be true by reason of the fact that the sending to a Member in former times of a challenge to a duel, which of course was a mere verbal assault, was treated as questioning of words spoken in debate and therefore a breach of privilege.

Now, it may be possible to argue from that, following the Duane case, to which the gentleman referred, that a libel might be so treated. But I did not so state, and I would not undertake to commit myself about that proposition.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I think it might be fairly stated that the remarks of the gentleman from West Virginia were subject to that deduction.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has 26 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, I have an amendment which I desire to send to the Clerk's desk and have read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out "and that in committing said assault Charles C. Glover has been guilty of a breach of the privileges and a contempt of the House of Representatives" and insert the following: "and that he appear and show cause, if any exists, why he should not be held in contempt of the House of Representatives."

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, I think that the committee can have no objection to this amendment, and I think that the reason for it ought to satisfy the House that it should be adopted.

In the first place, it is understood by Members of the House that in this proceeding we stand in the position both as accusers and also as judges. At this time we are making the accusation. In the courts of nearly all of the States and in the courts of the United States when a contempt is committed outside of the presence of the court a citation is issued by the court for the person to appear and show cause, if any, why he should not be punished for a contempt of the court, and on that process the warrant is issued, and the person appears before the tribunal and has an opportunity to make his showing.

Analogous to that, Mr. Speaker, we are citing this man to appear and answer for a contempt of this body. It is not certainly our intention to try and find him guilty now; and yet if we adopt this resolution as it is stated we will be doing so, because the language of the resolution is:

And that in committing said assault Charles C. Glover has been guilty of a breach of the privileges and a contempt of the House of Representatives.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. In just a moment I will. If we vote now for this resolution as it stands, we shall be determining in advance that he is in contempt of this House. I presume what we really mean is that we think he is in contempt of this House, and that we think so sufficiently strongly to cite him to appear and make his defense; but certainly we do not desire to try him in his absence, before he has had a right to appear and answer and show cause and make defense. We certainly do not desire to try him now and so estop ourselves from voting in his favor if he shall show that he ought not to be punished for a contempt of this House.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. The gentleman will recall that under the resolution the committee were instructed to ascertain whether or not a contempt had been committed by an assault upon a Member for words spoken in debate. The committee were directed to ascertain that fact. They have reported the fact to be as rumored. If the House were to adopt that resolution, would it not do exactly what this resolution does by declaring that these acts were committed and that they constituted a contempt?

Mr. TOWNER. I think not. The gentleman is too good a lawyer not to know that a court never issues a citation for a man to appear and show cause why he should not be held in contempt unless it thinks he is in contempt. And by the passage of this resolution in the form I suggest this House will be saying that it believes that these acts on the part of Mr. Glover make him guilty of a contempt of this House; but they do not so decide and determine, as this resolution expressly states. They ought only to cite him to appear and answer and show cause, if any he has, why he should not be punished for a contempt of this House.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. The gentleman is already advised by the reading of the report that there is another resolution to be offered following the adoption of this, or as an amendment to this, which will give to the accused his day in court.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. TOWNER. I am so advised, and that is only another reason why this language ought to be adopted, because we do not want to place ourselves at this time in the position of having determined already the guilt of the accused without his having an opportunity to be heard. We ought to say, if we so find, that we think he is in contempt, but we do not adjudge him so, and do not try and determine the case, as the language of this resolution would declare that we had, until he has had an opportunity to appear and show cause why such action should not be taken.

Mr. COVINGTON. Does not the gentleman know that every indictment at the criminal law contains this categorical form against the alleged offender, the statement that he has committed certain acts, and that those acts constitute a crime contrary to the act of assembly, or against the peace, government, and dignity of the State; and, notwithstanding the apparent adjudication by the grand jury, it sets forth succinctly the same fundamental principles that this resolution does, but yet he has his day in court.

Mr. TOWNER. But the gentleman ought to understand that this is not an indictment. An indictment is not found by the court or the jury that tries the case and determines the guilt. The indictment is found by the prosecutor, or the grand jury, an independent, outside party. He or it asserts the guilt of the defendant. But the judge, in an indirect charge for contempt, never asserts the guilt of the defendant. He only cites the defendant to appear, answer, and show cause if he can, why he should not be punished for a contempt of court. This is a different proceeding from a trial on an indictment. Gentlemen should realize that they ought not at the same time to charge and determine in advance the guilt of the defendant, and that without an opportunity of being heard; because if the House of Representatives by the passage of this resolution determines in advance that this man is guilty before he has had an opportunity before the bar of this House to show whether he is guilty or not, then the proceeding that may occur when he comes before this House will be a mere farce. We can not then determine whether or not he has shown cause why he should not be punished, for we will have already determined it against him. Of what use will it be for him to appeal to a body that has already found him guilty and has solemnly registered that finding in this resolution?

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Does the gentleman recall the preamble in the resolution originally offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT]?

Mr. TOWNER. I do not.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. That preamble charged Mr. Glover with assaulting a Member in a public park in the city of Washington for language spoken upon the floor of this House. If that be true, would not that be an offense against this House and a violation of its privileges, and would not that be a contempt of the House?

Mr. TOWNER. I do not discuss the question as to whether it would or not.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. If that be true, would it not?

Mr. TOWNER. I will not discuss that.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Does not Mr. Glover admit here that it is true?

Mr. TOWNER. That we do not know; and if it be true, of what use is it to cite him to appear and answer and show cause why he should not be punished for a contempt of the House? We are now determining in this resolution beforehand that he is guilty of a contempt, and we do so without his having his day in court. There is no court in America to-day that would punish any man for an infraction of its rules, or for anything that might be considered a contempt, that was indirect and not in the presence of the court, unless it first cited him to appear and allowed him an opportunity to show cause why such punishment should not be inflicted, and that is the course that is orderly and, I think, ought to be followed in this case.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. I will yield two minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COVINGTON].

Mr. COVINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to engage in any further discussion of the case except to call the attention of the House to a misapprehension which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] seems to have in regard to the resolution which has been offered.

As a matter of fact, the committee has no pride of opinion with respect to the resolution. It simply followed the precedent established by the resolution in the Houston case in 1832, where the subject was most carefully considered by the House.

The gentleman from Iowa has utterly failed to see that this resolution does not declare Mr. Glover guilty of contempt. It states that the warrant shall be issued for C. C. Glover "to answer the charge that" an assault has been committed by Mr. Glover upon the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], and that that assault constitutes a contempt of the House.

And, Mr. Speaker, the second resolution goes on to provide, with careful regard for the rights of the accused, that he shall be asked if he desires to be heard—which every lawyer in this House knows to mean if he desires to have a trial, and that he shall be asked if he desires to have counsel. In other words, after Mr. Glover has been brought to the bar of the House, what is, in substance, the indictment—that is to say, the findings of fact—shall be read to him. He is thus informed of the charge against him, and he may plead his guilt or demand a trial. If he denies the findings of fact, the House shall proceed with the trial of the case. If he admits the charge, the resolution provides that the House shall proceed to take order in the matter—that is, to adopt a resolution either discharging or reprimanding or imprisoning Mr. Glover. In every way the constitutional safeguards of the citizen have been secured to him as they would be secured to him in any court in the land.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PROUTY].

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, whom I recognize as being a good lawyer and a good judge, for I have known him many years, has fallen into a mistake in reading this resolution. I presume that he read it hastily and did not notice exactly what it said. I want to call attention of the House to the fact that the criticism he makes is not germane. The resolution does not find him guilty, but it charges him with two things: First, of having committed certain acts therein set out; and, second, that those things constitute a contempt of this House. He is cited here to answer both charges. In the letter he wrote he admitted the fact as to the commission of the acts, but questions the jurisdiction of this tribunal to declare them in contempt or to exercise any jurisdiction over the matter. I want to read the resolution, leaving out the immaterial matter.

On page 14 of the report it says: "That the said Charles C. Glover shall be brought to the bar of the House of Representatives on a day to be fixed in said warrant to answer," and so forth.

Now, second, as to the contempt of the House: "And that in committing said assault Charles C. Glover has been guilty of a breach of the privilege and a contempt of the House of Representatives." When the case is here he is to answer two propositions: First, did he commit the acts charged; and, second, has he any reason to show why it is not contempt of this House? Then the House can pass upon the question whether or not he has shown any reason why there was no contempt. But we are simply asking him to come into this House and answer two questions: First, did you do the things; and, second, are you guilty of contempt in so doing?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, it will be impossible for me in the short time which I have, to discuss any of the legal phases of this controversy. I have no doubt, however, that under the sixth section of the Constitution this House has the right to punish anyone who shall question anything that a Member may have said upon the floor of this House in debate. I have every confidence in the legal ability and the impartiality of the special committee which has this case in hand, and I shall vote to uphold the report of that committee.

It seems that this controversy between Mr. SIMS and Mr. Glover grew out of an option which Mr. Glover had upon some Rock Creek land. As I understand it, three bills were introduced in this House, one to sell that land upon which he had that option for $600.000. That bill was not passed in that Congress. The bill was reintroduced in the next Congress, and the price fixed in the second bill was $50,000 less than in the first bill. As I understand it a third bill was introduced fixing the sum at $423,000, being $177,000 less than the first bill.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman permit me to say right there that that is one of the statements with which Mr. Glover in his newspaper article found so much fault. Both Mr. Andrus and Mr. SIMS made that statement, and it is not at all in accordance with the facts. The $600,000 price and the $500,000 price and the $423,000 price were successive reductions on a piece of property relating to Meridian Hill property and not to the Rock Creek property on which Mr. Glover had an option, which was never offered for any other price than $423,000; and Mr. SIMS acknowledged it here on the floor, but attempted to excuse himself by saying it was toward midnight when he made that statement, and yet the fact is that after he made the statement, as the record shows, and I have just been consulting it, the House, on motion of Mr. PAYNE, of New York, at 6 o'clock and 15 minutes took a recess until 10 o'clock on the same evening, showing that the statement was made during the afternoon instead of toward midnight.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I decline to yield further. I am stating that those three bills were introduced, and the controversy came up over that matter. I do not know and I do not pretend to say who was right or who was wrong. I am not condemning Mr. Glover and I am not condemning Mr. SIMS, but I do know that Mr. SIMS in his speech upon the floor of this House declared that he did not intend to reflect upon Mr. Glover.

I am simply reciting the matter about which this controversy arose. Mr. Glover had no business and no right under the law to assault Mr. SIMS for words spoken in this House. As I understand it they are both about 60 years of age. I have never met Mr. Glover and I do not want to meet him, because I do not want my jaws slapped [laughter], but, as I understand it, he is an athlete. Well, we all know that Mr. SIMS is blessed or cursed, owing to the point of view, with an abnormal abdominal protuberance [laughter], and I think that Mr. Glover would have been just as much justified in assaulting a muscovy duck with both wings broken as he was in assaulting Mr. SIMS on that occasion. I think he had no right to do it. I have known Mr. SIMS ever since I have been in Congress. I am on a committee of which he is the chairman, and I can say that there is not in Congress a more honest, honorable, kinder-hearted man, and I do not believe that he would intentionally give offense to anyone.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman from Illinois desire to occupy any more time?

Mr. MANN. How much more time have I remaining, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. Seventeen minutes. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. MANN. Does anyone desire to be recognized for time in opposition to the resolution?

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. I will yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY].

Mr. MANN. First I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I shall consume only two minutes. The fundamental error, as I view it, into which the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] and some other gentlemen have fallen is this, that the offense with which Mr. Glover is charged is not that of assault and battery, but of committing acts which tend to obstruct this House in the performance of its official functions.

If Mr. Glover and Mr. SIMS had had an altercation over some business matter and the same act had been committed by Mr. Glover by reason of some offense which he imagined had been given by Mr. SIMS, no one would contend that this House would have any jurisdiction. On the other hand, if Mr. Glover had simply threatened Mr. SIMS instead of actually striking some blows, the offense given this House would have been committed in the same manner. It is alleged and asked that this whole matter be relegated to the courts. The fact is that no court has any jurisdiction and no court can try the offense with which Mr. Glover is charged.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman yields back his time. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON].

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I regret I was not able to be present when this debate began, and I have not had the time to examine this report as fully as I should have liked to have done, but I desire to state now the point which in my mind still remains in doubt. There is no doubt in my mind that the House of Representatives possesses power to punish for contempt, but whether or not the acts charged as contempt constitutes a contempt is not free from doubt in my mind. And for this reason, that the cases that are cited in this report are cases that necessarily interfere with the performance of the high functions of this House. For instance, two or three of those cases are attempted bribery. Of course, an attempted bribery tends to impede and frustrate the will of the people as expressed in legislation in the Congress and is self-evident contempt of the House. But the alleged ground against Mr. Glover in this case, as I understand it, is that he violated the provision of the Constitution which says that for any speech or words spoken in the House a Member shall not be questioned in any other place. Now, what is "questioning" in any other place? That is the exact point that we would like to have discussed in order to enable us to vote intelligently upon this case. Is the mere fact that you meet a Member on the street and say to him, "You voted against that bill yesterday; I have my opinion of you. What did you do it for?" Is that questioning or do the words in the Constitution, "shall not be questioned," mean you can not sue him for anything that he said, and if you bring an action for slander or libel for a false charge he could undoubtedly plead his privilege and that he could not therefore in law be questioned or held in damages. That is plain. But does that term go further than that and clothe him with any special right? Now, if the act of Mr. Glover to Mr. SIMS had tended directly to impede the proceedings of this House there would be no question in my mind that it would be contempt.

If he had sought to detain him from attending the sessions of the House, for instance; but that does not appear. It appears that Mr. SIMS was on his way from his residence, to where? Not to a session of the House but to an executive department of the Government. It may be true that he went there on official business, but it did not necessarily impede the work of the House in enacting legislation to stop him from going to the department when the House was not in session at the time. Therefore the act to prevent him from going to the department did not directly impede the proceedings in the House. Now, it seems to me that the case can be distinguished from a case of bribery which necessarily affects the dignity and the work of the legislative body, that this is a different case entirely. It did not directly keep Mr. SIMS from attending the sessions of the House as did the act of the sheriff who detained a Member on his way to attend a session of the House, cited in the report, and, therefore, it seems to me before I would be prepared to vote upon the final question of whether Mr. Glover is guilty of contempt of the House I should like to have a little more enlightenment upon that precise point. Do the words of the Constitution that are representative for words spoken here, "shall not be questioned in any other place," mean that he shall not be asked anything about it as was suggested by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. DILLON]? Does it mean that he shall not be criticized in a newspaper? If he were to be asked a question in a newspaper article or severely condemned, does that come within the distinction of questioning him under the constitutional term? There is a very grave question in my mind now whether or not the acts that are reported to have been committed here by the committee do come within the exact definition of whether or not it really did interfere with the work of the House and therefore would be a direct contempt of the House of Representatives, unless the assault had a direct tendency to prevent Mr. SIMS from attending the sessions of the House, or to influence his action upon a matter pending therein, by preventing his attendance or by duress or fear, I doubt whether the acts constitute a contempt of the House. I reserve my right to decide that question in the event the case should go to trial.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN. The House has heard very able arguments on both sides of the pending question, and it is not my disposition or desire to delay the vote upon it. I think, however, in the exercise of a great and fundamental and important power that is resident in the membership of the House of Representatives by virtue of the offices we hold, that we ought not to let an occasion like this pass without soberly realizing the extent of this power and the danger of its abuse.

To begin with, I agree entirely that an assault on a Member of Congress, whether during the time for which he is elected or thereafter, for words spoken upon the floor of the House, is an attack, not simply on the Member himself, but upon the House in its organized capacity, and I disagree with the suggestion made by the able gentleman from West Virginia, who made the opening speech on behalf of the committee, when he expressed his own personal view that when a Member's time of service ceases in the House of Representatives the House ceases to have interest in that question. I do not agree with that. I believe that it should be understood that if for words spoken by a Member of the House in the discharge of what he conceives to be his public duty, he could be assaulted violently and held to account after ceasing to be a Member of this body, it would very much embarrass the deliberations of the body. In the closing debates of a closing Congress, pending a possible change of administration, things may occur in heat, and if retiring Members could be called to an account immediately after the adjournment of Congress the beneficent influence of this protection would entirely disappear. If a man in debate on the 3d day of March, at the close of an administration, could be held to account day after to-morrow, on the 5th day of March, by violent assault or in any other way for what he said, that, I think, would very much undermine the effect of this necessary constitutional protection.

But I want to say another word, with the permission of the House, however, looking upon this great question from an entirely different angle. It is an extraordinary proceeding. It is an extraordinary power that is vested in the membership of the House. A man can not be held to account anywhere under the Constitution for statements he makes in official debate. Like the exercise of all great power, it should be used with moderation, and the privileges of debate ought not to be abused on the floor of the House. A man's reputation as a private citizen is just as dear and sacred to him as the reputation of a Member in his official capacity; and I never hear a Member in either branch of Congress assaulting the character and purposes of private citizens but that it seems to me it is in the nature of a reckless exercise of important constitutional power. I think that the statement of the gentleman from West Virginia that, in his opinion, it becomes unimportant to inquire into the nature or extent of the provocation for an assault of this kind, may not be absolutely well founded. I think the nature and extent of the provocation, whether the citizen is justly or unjustly assailed by a Member of the House, may be very properly taken into consideration in meting out punishment to the offender. I do not justify an assault upon a Member, no matter how great the provocation; but I do think, sitting, as we do here, as judges and jury and prosecutors, really, to judge of the question of the contempt of our own rights and immunities, it would be a very proper subject to inquire as to whether the provocation is great or little, for the purpose simply of determining what punishment ought to be administered.

Now, I am in entire accord with the recommendations of the committee. I have not made these observations to indicate anything to the contrary. I do believe that this unusual trial ought to be proceeded with. I realize, however, that in the very nature of the case the defendant is in an uneven contest. For that reason the House ought to mete out its conclusions with deliberation and with a just regard to the rights of others.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 2441) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. MARTIN of Virginia, Mr. OVERMAN, and Mr. WARREN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

CHARLES C. GLOVER.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the gentleman on the other side of the House is willing now to yield me eight minutes, on account of the time I have yielded.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 29 minutes.

Mr. MANN. I would like to have a little more than eight minutes.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. I will yield to the gentleman 10 minutes.

Mr. MANN. All right. I may ask for a little more later.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. I think we may be able to accommodate the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. My Speaker, I yield 10 minutes, then, to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER].

[Mr. COOPER addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON].

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, the law and facts in this case have already been very ably discussed. It is clear from the many precedents and from the many court decisions cited that this House has the inherent, the implied, and the express constitutional right and power to punish for contempt in cases of this kind. There is no room to reasonably doubt the fact that Mr. Glover made the assault as charged upon Mr. SIMS, and in doing so committed a contempt against this House.

It occurs to me, after listening several hours this afternoon to the circumstances and facts surrounding this case, to inquire what kind of District of Columbia special-privilege meat this man Glover must have eaten that he has grown so great that he feels free to make a brutal assault on any Member of this House, thus flinging insult and contempt at this House and at its honest legislative deliberations; and it seems that when this man then calmly, in that manner of self-assurance characteristic of men of his kind and business success, suggests that this House has no authority to defend itself from assaults of this character it is time that summary action should be taken. To-day one of the most severe indictments that the people of this country are bringing against our courts and legislative bodies is on account of the frequent long-drawn-out delays in performing their functions. I believe this is a rich opportunity for this House to set a good example for the courts and other legislative bodies in this country. I believe it is highly important—it is essential—that this case be soon finally concluded; that no commission of insanity be authorized, as was suggested a short time ago, nor that the recommendations of the committee be side-stepped in any way on mere technicalities.

I want to say that I wish to heartily congratulate the special committee that has had this matter in charge. They have most carefully considered the law and the facts and have brought in a resolution here that should be adopted. By adopting this resolution, by bringing Mr. Glover promptly to the bar of this House, by inflicting a just punishment upon him, and doing it without delay, will gain, I am sure, for this House not only the respect of the whole country but the respect of Mr. Glover as well.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I am inclined to think myself that the immunity expressly granted by the Constitution only relates to proceedings in court—that words spoken in debate can not be used as a basis for a suit or criminal action brought against the Member speaking them. But I have no doubt whatever that this legislative body, as other legislative bodies must have, has the inherent power to protect its own Members from assaults. The Member of Congress who takes the floor, or who even votes, ought to know that when he steps outside of the Chamber of the House he will not be met by a set of men who, perhaps, have threatened him in advance with their physical disapproval if he has spoken or voted contrary to their wishes. [Applause.] And such a Member, if so assaulted, ought to feel that the House itself will punish the offender, and not require him to take his chances by making a complaint in the police court or bringing suit in the form of a civil action. [Applause.]

The protection of a Member is not for his own advantage, it is not for his own personal protection, but it is in order that the legislative body representing a great, free people shall be free to act according to the best judgment of its individual Members, without fear of those who happen to be locally surrounding the Chamber on the outside. I, for one, am in favor, whenever the question is raised before the House, of protecting not merely the dignity of the House but the sanctity of the proceedings in the House, by protecting the individual Members of the House when they are physically assaulted, when they leave the Chamber, for what they say or do here. [Applause.]

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY].

Mr MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, the question before the House is hardly a question as to whether Mr. SIMS made a true statement on the floor of the House, nor is the question, on the other hand, primarily whether Mr. Glover was justified in making the attack. The question is as to the right the people of this country have given to their Members of Congress to encourage them in expressing their most inward secrets.

Now, the makers of our Constitution have left four provisions in relation to this matter: First, no man can be arrested while attending upon Congress; second, no Member shall be questioned in any other place for any statement made in debate; third, the provision for segregation of the Capitol site from any States of the Union by its location in the District. Does anyone suppose for a moment that this District was cut out only to build parks upon? Any man who is acquainted with constitutional history will understand that with certain delegated or reserved powers to the States, supreme so far as they exist, it would have been unwise to have established a government in any one of them, and so it was intended by those great statesmen who made this great Federal nationality, when they provided that the Capitol itself should be segregated, to give Congress complete control over it. I take it there is no doubt but that there exists the inherent power to punish as for contempt in every legislative body, just as it exists in every court of record under the common law.

I was surprised and astonished at the statement made by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] when he undertook to say that no such power ever existed or could exist. I would not have been surprised, knowing his surroundings, if he had said, "I do not believe in the power," because I realize that the doctrine of I. W. W. ism, opposed as it is to every kind of supreme power, and so necessary to safe and stable government, would tear down the old flag and call it a dirty rag; but when this gentleman makes a declaration that such power to punish for contempt is not the law, he certainly can have but litle respect for his own opinion as a lawyer. But back of this we read in the history of the old republics of Germany, that these petty republics along the Rhine more than 2,000 years ago met together annually to legislate, and they encouraged each other to get on a drunk for three days and then to sober down and proceed to deliberate. This was thought necessary in those times because it was an encouragement for every individual in the state of intoxication to give out his most inward secrets, and if the American people could get from every Member of both Houses of Congress a straight declaration of his most inward secrets, it would be best for the American people.

The purpose of this provision and this power lodged in Congress is not to protect me; it is not to protect you; but to encourage the Members of this body to say what they desire to say about every man and every measure in order that the people may know that the Member is free from all fear. So it ceases to be a question of the protection of Mr. Glover or the protection of Mr. Sims. It is the maintenance of a doctrine that will encourage freedom of speech on the floor of this body, and I want to predict now to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] that he may find in but a short time that he will be met in this city with thugs of the corporate interests if he gets as enthusiastic in opposition to that corporate interest as he has on the other side of this question.

Sooner or later the American people are going to understand that this is a corporate-ridden city and District, where the public-service corporations are oppressing the people; and when thousands of employees of the Government have to pay an extra charge to the public-service corporations, it means extra public salary. Whenever the people understand that, they are going to demand of Congress the absolute regulation and control of public-service corporations, and I warn the gentleman from Kansas, if he stands up here and makes the fight as earnestly in behalf of the people of this Republic as he does this individual [Glover], he may be met upon the street the next day by the thugs of the corporate interests of the District. If I am in Congress I expect to be standing with the people, and I expect Congress to protect me against any such assault; and so this is not a question of any individual right—this is a question of the interest of the great American people. Our forefathers knew that while here and there an individual may be slandered without redress, yet in this great body of the representatives of the people we must have free and open discussion. They knew another thing. They knew that an honest man has no fear of slander. It is the truth that hurts. I have been slandered and so have you, but it never hurt me, nor will it hurt any other honest man. It is the truth that hurts. And now I say in reply to the statement made by the gentleman a while ago that we ought to be very lenient in this punishment. I want to say, my friends, we have heard the arguments touching the tendency of the times; and what is that tendency? Is it against a constitutional Government with a national power? No. The tendency of the times is that we are against a Government that is too weak for the strong and too strong for the weak.

Mr. Glover is a man of wealth, and if he were an humble hodcarrier we would not be long making up our minds. Let us see that he bear the penalty just the same as the great, immortal Sam Houston, governor of two States, Member of Congress, once a President of a Republic which he carved out of the wilderness—the Lone Star Republic [applause] of Texas—a great general, a great statesman, and yet when he trespassed upon this power he had to suffer not only at the hands of the Congress but at the hands of the courts. After he was punished by Congress he was indicted and convicted in the court of the District of Columbia. Let us be just as square, and let us return to those days when the Government would be equally strong upon the strong as it was upon the weak. Let us convict this man if the evidence is true and give him sufficient punishment. [Applause.]

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Seven minutes.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COVINGTON].

Mr. COVINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to the resolution now pending.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

That when Charles C. Glover shall be brought to the bar of the House to answer the charge of having violated the privilege of the House of Representatives by having made an assault upon Representative THETUS W. SIMS, of the State of Tennessee, for words spoken by said Representative SIMS on the floor of the House of Representatives, the Speaker shall then cause to be read to the said Charles C. Glover the findings of facts by the special committee of the House charged with the duty of investigating whether or not the said assault had in fact been committed as alleged, and whether or not the said Charles C. Glover had violated the privileges of the House of Representatives by said assault. The Speaker shall then inquire of the said Charles C. Glover if he desires to be heard, and to have counsel, on the charge of being in contempt of the House of Representatives for having violated its privileges. If the said Charles C. Glover desires to avail himself of either of these privileges, the same shall be granted him; if not, the House shall thereupon proceed to take order in the matter.

Mr. COVINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to discuss the amendment. I simply want to call attention——

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COVINGTON. I do.

Mr. MANN. As I understood the amendment read, that is the second resolution in the report of the committee?

Mr. COVINGTON. It is. It simply makes one continuous resolution. I simply want to state for the benefit of those Members who were not in the Chamber at the time the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] had time yielded to him, that there was offered an amendment to correct, as he thought, certain language in the first resolution offered upon the theory that the resolution was attempting in advance to charge Mr. Glover with being guilty of contempt before he had had an opportunity to answer and that as a matter of fact the amendment will do nothing that was not already set out succinctly in the resolution. It will make it necessary to demand a separate vote upon that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Towner amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the resolution by striking out the clause "and that in committing said assault Charles C. Glover has been guilty of a breach of the privileges and a contempt of the House of Representatives" and insert in lieu thereof "and that he appear and show cause, if any exists, why he should not be held in contempt of the House of Representatives."

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Maryland give his attention? This last paper which the gentleman sent up here to the Clerk's desk is really part and parcel of the original resolution, is it not?

Mr. COVINGTON. That is true, Mr. Speaker, but at the time the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS], chairman of the committee, offered the resolution he offered what is apparently a separate resolution, the first part of that in the printed report, and this is the second part of that resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I want to ask the gentleman a question. As I understood the reading of his resolution, it does not contain the identical language of the resolution as printed.

Mr. COVINGTON. It is identically the language in the resolution.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Then the Clerk omitted about a line in reading it.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment again, without objection.

Mr. COVINGTON. Mr. Speaker, in order that there may be no misconception about it, I state that it will be the printed resolution.

The SPEAKER. The one you are going to have a vote on is the one the Clerk has in his hand.

Mr. MANN. Let the Clerk read it from the printed report, and then we will know what it is.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. STAFFORD. I would like to direct the attention of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COVINGTON] to the fact that in examining the resolution of the chairman of the committee, sent to the Clerk's desk this morning, there is a certain date stated, whereas in the resolution printed there is no certain date printed.

Mr. TOWNER. As I understand the gentleman from Maryland, this is one resolution instead of two? It will make it only one?

Mr. COVINGTON. That is the idea.

Mr. TOWNER. In other words, this resolution that is printed on page 14 is not to be considered as a separate resolution, but as a part of the resolution originally offered?

Mr. COVINGTON. That is precisely the intention.

Mr. MANN. Now it is the second resolution that is to be read?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That when Charles C. Glover shall be brought to the bar of the House to answer the charge of having violated the privilege of the House of Representatives by having made an assault upon Representative THETUS W. SIMS, of the State of Tennessee, for words spoken by said Representative SIMS on the floor of the House of Representatives, the Speaker shall then cause to be read to the said Charles C. Glover the findings of facts by the special committee of the House charged with the duty of investigating whether or not the said assault had in fact been committed as alleged, and whether or not the said Charles C. Glover had violated the privileges of the House of Representatives by said assault. The Speaker shall then inquire of the said Charles C. Glover if he desires to be heard, and to have counsel, on the charge of being in contempt of the House of Representatives for having violated its privileges. If the said Charles C. Glover desires to avail himself of either of these privileges, the same shall be granted him; if not, the House shall thereupon proceed to take order in the matter.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the Covington amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amended resolution.

Mr MANN. Mr. Speaker, in order that it may show the vote, I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 200, noes 4.

So the resolution as amended was agreed to.

Mr. COVINGTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COVINGTON. Is the Speaker now about to execute the action in warrant for the apprehension of Mr. Glover?

The SPEAKER. That is exactly what he is about to do.

Mr. COVINGTON. May I ask further from the Speaker if he knows from the Sergeant at Arms whether there is a reasonable certainty that the warrant will be executed this afternoon? I think the House may very well know that.

The SPEAKER. The Speaker does not know that. The Chair has been informed that Mr. Glover is within the building and can be very easily found. I do not know him of my own knowledge. I never saw the gentleman in my life. The precedents in the case seem to show that when Mr. Glover is brought in Members will not be allowed to confer with him until the matter is finished.

PRINT OF TARIFF BILL.

Mr. MANN. While we are not very active about business, I think there are one or two printing propositions that we might dispose of.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that 5,000 copies of H. R. 3321 may be printed, 1,000 copies to go to the document room and 4,000 copies to go to the folding room, for the use of the Members, in the form that the bill went to the Senate.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, would that necessitate a separate resolution?

Mr. MANN. No. That is under $500.

Mr. BARNHART. All right.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. One thousand copies to go to the document room and 4,000 copies to the folding room, in the form in which the bill went to the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] asks unanimous consent that there shall be printed 5,000 copies of the tariff bill in the shape in which it went to the Senate, 1,000 copies for the use of the document room and 4,000 copies for the use of the folding room. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, at the request of several gentlemen, I ask unanimous consent that those who have spoken on the Glover resolution before the House this afternoon shall have leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that those who have spoken on this Glover matter to-day may have the right to print and extend their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, is that request granted?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. CARLIN. For how long a time?

Mr. MANN. There is no limit of time. There were only a few gentlemen who spoke.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Unanimous consent has been granted.

SAN DIEGO EXPOSITION.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask unanimous consent, on behalf of the gentleman from California [Mr. KETTNER], for the consideration of a bill relating to the admission of goods to the exposition at San Diego, Cal. It is necessary for this to pass speedily in order that they may allow the laborers to dispose of the foreign exhibits as they come in, in the exposition buildings.

Mr. MANN. I think that might take a few minutes, and there is no trouble about taking it up to-morrow.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, then, I will let it go over.

REPORT OF THE MONEY TRUST INVESTIGATION.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which he sends to the Clerk's desk, which the Clerk will report.

House resolution 100.

Resolved, That there shall be printed 2,500 copies of the report of the Money Trust investigation, for the use of the House document room, at a cost of $452.32.

Mr. MANN. The cost does not want to go into the resolution itself. It is no part of the resolution.

Mr. FINLEY. I understand that; but it is for the information of the House.

Mr. MANN. It is reported at the bottom of the resolution.

Mr. FINLEY. It is at the bottom of the resolution, but it is no part of it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire if there is any provision for these reports to be made available to the Members in the folding room? If they are sent to the document room there will be none at our command. I would like to have some at my command for the benefit of those who request them.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I will say for the information of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] that the edition of 2,500 copies provided for by the resolution is practically the limit that the House can provide for by simple resolution. I think the understanding is that if that does not supply the demand there will be at once a similar resolution to provide an additional allotment. If that does not suffice, the demand can be supplied by a concurrent resolution.

Mr. FINLEY. I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that this will not be the end of it if more copies are desired.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

CHARLES C. GLOVER.

The SPEAKER signed and delivered to the Sergeant at Arms the following warrant:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Ninth day of May, 1913, ss:

To ROBERT B. GORDON, Sergeant at Arms, greeting:

Whereas the House of Representatives of the United States on the 9th day of May, 1913, then being in session in the city of Washington, D. C., did resolve that the Speaker do issue his warrant directed to the Sergeant at Arms commanding him to take into custody wherever to be found the body of Charles C. Glover, of the city of Washington, D. C., and the same in custody to keep, and that the said Charles C. Glover be brought to the bar of the House of Representatives on the 9th day of May, 1913, to answer the charge that he, on Friday, April 18, 1913, in the city of Washington, D. C., committed an assault upon the person of Representative THETUS W. SIMS, a Representative in the Sixty-third Congress from the State of Tennessee, because of words spoken by the said Representative SIMS in debate on the floor of the House of Representatives while the House was in regular session during the Sixty-second Congress, and that in committing said assault he, the said Charles C. Glover, has been guilty of a breach of the privileges and a contempt of the House of Representatives:

These are therefore to require you, Robert B. Gordon, Sergeant at Arms for the House of Representatives of the United States, forthwith to take into your custody the body of said Charles C. Glover, of the city of Washington, D. C., and him safely to keep, and to bring him before the bar of the House of Representatives on the 9th day of May, 1913; and all marshals and deputy marshals, civil officers of the United States, and every other person are hereby required to be aiding and assisting you in the execution thereof, for which this shall be your sufficient warrant.

Given under my hand this 9th day of May, 1913.

CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

In testimony of the authority of this warrant, witness the seal of the House of Representatives of the United States this 9th day of May, 1913.

SOUTH TRIMBLE,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

The Sergeant at Arms made the following return:

RETURN.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., 9th day of May, 1913, ss:

To Hon. CHAMP CLARK, Speaker, greeting:

Received the within warrant on the 9th day of May, A. D. 1913, and pursuant to its command I did, on the 9th day of May, A. D. 1913, as directed, take into custody the body of said Charles C. Glover therein named and brought him forthwith to the bar of the House of Representatives.

Given under my hand this 9th day of May, 1913.

R. B. GORDON,
Sergeant at Arms, House of Representatives.

The Sergeant at Arms (Mr. Robert B. Gordon) appeared at the bar of the House, having in custody the respondent, Mr. Charles C. Glover.

The SERGEANT AT ARMS. Mr. Speaker, according to instructions, I now present the person of Charles C. Glover.

The SPEAKER. Mr. Glover, you will give heed to the findings of fact by the special committee, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

FINDINGS OF FACT.

That Representative THETUS W. SIMS while on his way from his residence in the city of Washington to the Post Office Department on official business on Friday morning, April 18, 1913, was accosted in Farragut Square, in the city of Washington, by Charles C. Glover, who, after applying to him certain epithets, assaulted him by striking him in the face.

That the said Charles C. Glover committed the assault upon Representative SIMS because of statements made by Representative SIMS in debate on the floor of the House of Representatives at several times during the session of the House in the Sixty-second Congress, in which Congress the said Representative SIMS was also a Representative from the State of Tennessee.

The SPEAKER. Mr. Glover, do you desire to be heard, and to have counsel, on the charge of being in contempt of the House of Representatives, for having violated its privilege?

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Speaker, I admit the facts to be as found, but earnestly disclaim all intention to show disrespect to this House or its Members, or to invade their privileges. Nor did I know, at the time of the occurrence, that I was doing either.

I express my deep regret and offer my sincere apology.

The SPEAKER. The Sergeant at Arms will furnish Mr. Glover with a chair.

Mr. Glover sat down.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution in behalf of the special committee appointed by the House in charge of this investigation.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

House resolution 101.

Resolved, That the Speaker do reprimand Charles C. Glover, now at the bar of the House, for the breach of privileges of the House by him committed; and that the said Charles C. Glover be thereupon discharged from further custody.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, the House, by a practically unanimous vote, has just decided that it has the inherent power to punish for breach of its privileges, and it has decided that Mr. Glover is in contempt of this House for having made an assault upon Representative SIMS for the words used by him in debate.

This House, Mr. Speaker, will ever maintain and preserve its dignity, its integrity, and its right to legislate without interference from anyone; but while in my judgment the House will always maintain that right, it will never be vindictive or inflict punishment out of proportion to the offense committed against it. It will pass judgment in each case according to the facts of the case, always seasoning justice with mercy, for if we err, we prefer to do it on the side of mercy.

Mr. Speaker, there have been numerous cases of breach of privilege of the House, and I want to refer the House to the punishment inflicted in many of those cases.

In 1796 Mr. Gunn was reprimanded.

In 1816 Mr. Fry was reprimanded.

In 1818 John Anderson was reprimanded.

In the case in 1832, of Gen. Sam Houston, with which the Members of the House are familiar, he was reprimanded.

Mr. Field, who in 1865 made an assault upon Representative Kelly, wounding him with a knife, was discharged with a reprimand. And in every instance but one, while the House has always maintained its right to punish, it has inflicted a reprimand, that one exception being in the case of Patrick Woods.

Mr. Speaker, the object of punishment is to have a deterrent effect, and in my judgment the certainty of punishment, more than its severity, will accomplish that purpose.

The committee in its investigation made no report to the House as to the form the punishment in this case should take, because the committee did not know what the conduct of Mr. Glover at this time would be.

It is unquestionably and undeniably the right of the House of Representatives to punish for contempt by imprisonment in the jail of the District of Columbia during the term that this Congress lasts. But in view of the turn that this case has taken, in view of Mr. Glover having apologized to the House, and having expressed his regret for what occurred in this case, the committee have directed me to offer the resolution for a reprimand.

Mr. Speaker, to bring the matter to a close, I demand the previous question on the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia demands the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to unanimously.

Mr. Glover rose.

The SPEAKER. Charles C. Glover, the House of Representatives, after thorough and patient investigation of both the law and the facts, made by a special committee of five eminent lawyers of the House, appointed by the Speaker, brought in a resolution declaring that you had violated the privileges of the House and acted in a manner derogatory to the dignity of the body by assaulting a Member for words spoken in debate on the floor of the House; and after full debate the House almost unanimously adopted that resolution.

The freedom of speech and the immunity from being questioned elsewhere for words spoken in debate on the floor of the House and also of the Senate, guaranteed by the Constitution, lie at the very root of our free institutions. You violated both grossly by your conduct. In your anger you struck a blow at constitutional government.

From the very inception of parliamentary government among English-speaking peoples the principles which I have stated have been universally adopted and practiced.

This is not a case of a Member of Congress against the prisoner at the bar. It is the House of Representatives in its assembled capacity asserting its freedom of speech and the dignity of the House, which are necessary for the free and wise transaction of the public business. It is not so much to punish an individual as it is for the public good, to the end that the Republic may endure.

The House passed a resolution directing the Speaker to issue his warrant and deliver it to the Sergeant at Arms for your arrest, and the same has been done. The mandate of the warrant has been complied with by the Sergeant at Arms by bringing your body to the bar of the House.

Acting with the moderation, the care, the wisdom, and the justice with which people of our race act, they gave you a chance to be heard either in person or by counsel in mitigation before they would determine the punishment for your very grave offense against the Constitution of your country. You elected to be heard in your own proper person; you have acknowledged the facts as charged; you have apologized to the House; you have expressed your regrets; you have asserted your ignorance of the fact that you were violating the privileges of the House and the Constitution of the United States. This statement on your part, no doubt, influenced the Members in the leniency of the punishment which they determined upon, and that was that the Speaker should reprimand you for your very grave offense.

It must be apparent that a Representative or a Senator in his individual capacity has no more rights than any other citizen of the Republic, and he is clothed by the Constitution with the immunity from being questioned elsewhere for words uttered in debate on the floor of the House so that they may speak their minds freely without fear and without embarrassment. This is for the public weal. If one person is permitted to go unpunished for an assualt upon one Representative for words spoken in debate on the floor of the House, every person can assault a Representative for words used in debate on the floor of the House, and free speech is at an end, free government is at an end.

Not only that, but to assault a Representative or a Senator for words spoken in debate on the floor of either House might compel a good man who does not want to kill anybody to perform that very act.

The Chair therefore reprimands you, Charles C. Glover, in the name of and by direction of the House of Representatives, and directs the Sergeant at Arms to remove you from the Hall of the House and to discharge you from custody.

Thereupon Mr. Glover left the Hall of the House.

ADDITIONAL DISTRICT JUDGE FOR EASTERN PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Chairman, I submit the following privileged resolution from the Committee on Rules.

House resolution 97 (H. Rept. 16).

Resolved, That immediately after the adoption of this rule the House shall proceed to the consideration of the bill H. R. 32, to provide for the appointment of an additional district judge in and for the eastern district of Pennsylvania.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, just one minute, and I think I can convince the House that the resolution should be adopted immediately and the bill to which it refers passed promptly. The resolution has been unanimously reported by the Committee on Rules, and provides for the consideration of a bill that the Judiciary Committee would undoubtedly report favorably on at once. Therefore I move the previous question on the resolution and ask for its adoption.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas moves the previous question.

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Has the gentleman debated it so that it will cut off further debate?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that he debated it enough to do that.

Mr. HENRY. I hope the resolution will be adopted so that we can take up the bill.

Mr. MANN. It will not be if I can help it.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I did not know that such a resolution was coming in. The truth is I have had a rather unfortunate experience with the minority members of the Committee on Rules, because I rarely obtain any information concerning the rule to be reported to the House until it is reported in the House. I hope the gentleman from Kansas will take that chiding good-naturedly, because I think it is deserved.

Mr. CAMPBELL rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. CAMPBELL. To ask the gentleman from Illinois if he will yield.

Mr. MANN. I will yield for an apology or an explanation. [Laughter.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I was informed last night that there would be a meeting of the Committee on Rules this morning at 11 o'clock for the purpose of holding a hearing, but that nothing would be done except to have the hearing. I stated to the chairman of the committee that if that was all that was to occur, in view of the fact that I expected to participate in the discussion of the privileged resolution which was to be brought up in the House this morning at 11 o'clock, I would not attend the meeting of the Committee on Rules, and I did not attend. That may be construed into an explanation or an apology by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Kansas misapprehended what I said. I said that there would be a hearing and other matters to be considered, and a formal committee notice was issued, and the gentleman must have received it this morning.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I had the notice that the gentleman from Texas gave me last night.

Mr. HENRY. Yes; and the committee had a quorum present. There were two Republican members there this morning, and we had no other idea than to act on this particular matter.

Mr. CAMPBELL. My understanding of what the chairman of the Committee on Rules stated last night was that there was to be merely a hearing.

Mr. HENRY. Oh, several gentlemen came up to present their views about some other matters, and then we were to dispose of this matter.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will notify the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that his time is running.

Mr. MANN. I know it. I do not know who was at the meeting. All I know is that I had no idea that such a resolution was coming in. What are the facts in the case? For many years certain lawyers in the judicial district taking in West Virginia, Virginia, and North Carolina have been endeavoring to obtain the appointment of a new judge.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. There are about 40 or 400 of them who desire to be appointed. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, this resolution is not the one to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. HENRY. Not at all.

Mr. HARDWICK. This is a resolution providing for another judge in the eastern district of the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. MANN. I did not know that. I did not know that the gentleman from Pennsylvania had gotten in his work quite so soon. The House ought to have opportunity to know what is coming up. Here is a proposition brought into the House after 5 o'clock in the evening for the adoption of a rule to immediately take up a bill which nobody knows anything about, which has not been reported upon, to provide an additional United States judge. For 16 years, sitting in this House, I have heard gentlemen on the other side of the aisle assert time and again that there was too much litigation in the Federal courts, too many judges in the Federal courts, and that we ought to restrict the amount of business to be transacted in the Federal courts. In the judicial title revision act, which we passed three or four years ago, or less, we did restrict the amount of business which could be carried on in the Federal courts. We restricted the suits which could be commenced in the Federal courts and restricted the suits which could be removed from the State court to the Federal court. That side of the House has already announced its intention, through the appropriation act, that it proposes to abolish the Commerce Court, which will transfer four or five judges now in the Commerce Court to the circuits, where they can perform the work of district judges.

I had supposed that there was sufficient patronage to go to the Democratic side to last for a few weeks or a few months before you would commence to create new and needless places in order to provide appointments. I have no doubt that gentlemen will be able to produce the certificates of lawyers that they need more judges. I think you could provide 10 new Federal judges in the city of Chicago, and within a year obtain a petition signed by thousands of lawyers, many of whom had never been inside the Federal court, insisting that in order to get prompt disposition of litigation they must have a new or 10 new Federal judges. We have gone to the limit in providing United States court judges. What we ought to do is to further restrict the suits that can be brought in the Federal courts. Only recently in some act we provided a further restriction as to suits that could be brought, and provided that no suit could be brought in the Federal court against a State official for carrying out a State law. Much of the litigation in the Federal courts in recent years has been in the form of injunction suits brought against State officials to prevent the enforcement of State laws, particularly those which related to railroad rates.

There are a number of propositions pending, some of which, I think, ought to be enacted into law, further restricting the litigation in the Federal courts. I do not believe that there is any occasion for taking the great mass of suits brought in the State courts out of the State courts and into the Federal courts, and yet we keep on adding to the Federal courts. A man who is now appointed a Federal judge in a great many cases thinks as soon as he is appointed a Federal judge his time is his own and he forgets to work very hard.

I do not know how much the political necessities may demand the appointment of this judge. I do not know whether this judge was asked for in the last session or not. I do not recall, but it was not granted; that I know. We have not added many new judges in the last few years. I do not think we ought to add any while we are taking away jurisdiction from them, while we know that the intention of the Democratic side of the House is to abolish the Commerce Court, which has four judges. I was referring awhile ago to the appointment of a circuit-court judge in the circuit immediately south of us—a proposition which has been pending before Congress for many years, bitterly opposed by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB], who defeated, with the aid of some of the rest of us, a proposition reported in here at one time to provide that circuit judge. That is in another bill now pending, and the reason I supposed that was to come up here was because a gentleman was endeavoring to persuade me to-day that that bill ought to pass. There is another job that somebody wants. Why, gentlemen, it will not be possible for the Democratic Party to provide enough new Federal judges to give every lawyer who wants a job a place—not all the disappointed ones. There will be many who will be asking patronage. I should have supposed the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, for whom I have high regard, would have had enough trouble with the tariff bill and the disposition of patronage in Pennsylvania to satisfy him without asking for another place. The Lord knows I would hate to have that job. I have profound sympathy for anyone who has to distribute jobs or distribute patronage. I have profound sympathy for the President of the United States, upon whom rests the burden in some way of appointing thousands of persons to thousands of different places. I had hoped that we might at least pass through a special session of Congress, called to consider the tariff, without commencing the making of new places, unneeded, to provide jobs for disappointed job seekers. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has seven minutes remaining.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman's speech was based on an erroneous idea altogether. We are not creating an additional place. If he had waited 15 minutes he would not have made the speech. I desire to yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER], who will convince, I think, every Member of this House that this bill should be passed and passed now.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, the principal complaint of the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] seems to be that he does not know enough about this bill, and he takes the minority Members of the Rules Committee to task for not having informed him about this rule. I expect that is the reason why the distinguished gentleman from Illinois talked so much further beside the mark to-day than he usually does, for I feel quite convinced, as the gentleman from Texas has said, that if the gentleman from Illinois had known anything whatever about this bill—and, of course, he ought to have known about it, because his followers on the Committee on Rules should have advised him—he would not have made anything like the sort of argument that he has presented here.

Mr. Speaker, this bill provides for an additional judge for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, and it provides, also, that whenever a vacancy shall occur in the office of the district judge for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, senior in commission, such vacancy shall not be filled and thereafter there shall be but two district judges in said district. Now, the fact is that at the present time in this great eastern district of Pennsylvania there are two district judges. It comprises the city and county of Philadelphia and five large outlying counties, having a population altogether of something like two and a half million persons. The two judges are Judge Thompson and Judge Holland, Judge Holland being the senior in commission on that bench. Now, it is a difficult and delicate thing to say, but this House is, of course, entitled to know the whole truth about the matter, and the fact is that Judge Holland, who is senior in commission upon this bench, is now in such physical condition as to hold out absolutely no hope that he will ever be able to return to the bench. He is, I may truthfully say, a very sick man. He has been compelled to leave his work and go to the South in what everyone agrees is an absolutely vain search for health.

He has what I am advised is an absolutely incurable malady. Mr. Speaker, Judge Holland has been upon that district bench for nine years, appointed when the judgeship was created. He had been theretofore a United States district attorney. He is a man 53 years of age, has never received large salaries in the positions which he has occupied, has comparatively small means, and, consequently, it would be a great hardship upon him if, in order to give the people of Philadelphia the opportunity to have their cases decided promptly by that court, he would have to retire from the bench in order to permit a man to be put there in his place. It would not be fair to a man who has been such a great judge as Judge Holland has been in that court, when ill health of this kind has overtaken him, at the very time when he most needs the little salary which the place affords, to compel him to leave the bench, because this Congress would not put, for at most a very short time, an extra judge upon that bench.

The salary is $7,000 per annum.

This Congress has done this thing before in three or four cases. I think, in the Sixty-second Congress, it was done in the Baltimore district where Judge Morris had become incapacitated from a further service on the bench. And I doubt very much if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], who has as kind a heart as any man in the House, interposed any objection.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMER. In just a minute. Congress passed a law to provide for an additional judge in that district, with a provision that when the vacancy occurred senior in commission it should be filled. The President appointed a judge to that place, Judge Morris soon thereafter died, and the court is now the same size that it was before.

Mr. MOORE. Do I understand from the gentleman's statement that the passage of this bill will not prejudice the position now held by Judge Holland?

Mr. PALMER. It would not.

Mr. MOORE. It does not mean the crowding out of the present judge?

Mr. PALMER. It does not. It means as it says. Judge Holland is senior in commission, and when a vacancy occurs in senior in commission it will not be filled. That means that Judge Holland would serve out his lifetime.

Mr. MOORE. It would be unfortunate, as the gentleman states, if Judge Holland, who has been a faithful judge, should by reason of his illness be forced out of his position through the passage of this bill. I wanted to have the gentleman's statement as to the effect of the bill.

Mr. PALMER. What I was referring to about the hardship on Judge Holland contemplated the answer some gentleman might make, that if a gentleman is incapacitated he ought to retire. That sometimes might be true, but sometimes it would be a hardship on a faithful public official, as in this particular case.

Mr. MOORE. There is no means by which a Federal judge can be retired on pay, and it would be well to have it understood that the bill does not dispossess a faithful judge.

Mr. PALMER. It would not. It means that Judge Holland would remain on the bench during life or good behavior, and another judge would do the work which he has been doing up to several months ago, when he was compelled to entirely give up, as my colleague knows.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMER. I yield.

Mr. BUTLER. As my colleague knows, I have known Judge Holland well for 30 years. He has been my personal friend. I did not know until just now that his condition of health was as bad as the gentleman states it is. I know the gentleman states the facts as he has them, but I did not know until this very minute that it was anticipated that Judge Holland might die. I know he is a great sufferer, and I know he has been unable to attend to public business for some time. But I had not anticipated that Judge Holland's life might not be prolonged.

Mr. PALMER. I will say to my colleague it was a very difficult thing for me to say, and yet I feel the House is entitled to the information.

I have not seen Judge Holland personally for a long time, but members of the Philadelphia bar, of the very highest standing, men like Mr. William A. Glasgow, jr., Mr. Charles Biddle, Judge McPherson, who sits upon the same bench, and Judge

Gray, the circuit court judge in that district, came before the Committee on the Judiciary, and all of them who referred to Judge Holland's physical condition agreed with the statement that I now make, that it was such as to hold out absolutely no hope whatever that he could return to his work upon the bench.

Mr. BUTLER. Does my colleague know the condition of the public business in that court?

Mr. PALMER. I know that it is very much congested. I have a statement here, showing the number of days that the judges have been sitting on the bench, and the efforts that have been made to relieve the court by calling in outside judges, and I shall present that statement to the House during the consideration of the resolution. Again, Judge McPherson——

Mr. BUTLER. What request has Judge McPherson made?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I left?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has nine minutes.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes more to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman speak of Judge McPherson's request?

Mr. PALMER. This bill was introduced in the last Congress, before the close of the Congress, and a hearing was held before the Committee on the Judiciary, which was attended by Judge George Gray, Judge McPherson, and many lawyers of the Philadelphia bar; and Judge Gray and Judge McPherson, as well as the lawyers, agreed in the statement to the committee that it was absolutely necessary for the proper conduct of the business of that court that this judgeship should be created temporarily.

Mr. BUTLER. Was a report made upon the bill?

Mr. PALMER. There was no report made upon the bill, although I think the Committee on the Judiciary was unanimously in favor of it, because the matter was drawn to my attention by the Philadelphia bar so late in the session that there could be no hope that the Committee on the Judiciary could be reached in the House in order to pass the bill through the House, and it was not reported on that account.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. PALMER. I yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. My recollection is that a bill was passed for the relief of Judge Ricks, of northern Ohio, a few years ago.

Mr. PALMER. There have been a number of bills of that kind passed. The most recent one was the Morris case, I think.

Mr. HENRY. In one of the Texas districts Judge Rector became incapacitated, and we passed such a bill as this, but he lived for several years, although he was unable to perform his duties on the bench. When he died there was no successor appointed for him.

Mr. BUTLER. I know that we shall lose that judgeship if Judge Holland unfortunately should die.

Mr. PALMER. Let me say to my colleague regarding Judge Holland's condition that this judgeship is being asked for by members of the Philadelphia bar whom he knows, and I am quite sure that he will agree that they would make no such request were the facts not as we state them. Men like John G. Johnson——

Mr. BUTLER. The statement of Judge McPherson would convince me of the necessity. I know him well.

Mr. PALMER. The committee on the creation of judicial vacancies as part of the Law Association of Philadelphia, which is the Bar Association, which takes charge of such matters, of which Mr. John G. Johnson, one of the leaders of the American bar, is chairman, unanimously adopted resolutions asking Congress to do this very thing.

If I have time, Mr. Speaker, if this rule is adopted, as I hope it will be, during the consideration of the resolution I shall be glad to show the House the amount of business which has been done in this court and the necessity for the judgeship, aside from the question of the physical incapacity of Judge Holland.

I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that he does me an injustice in intimating that we are attempting to get this place for political purposes. I introduced this bill in the Sixty-second Congress. I have no interest in it whatever. I agree with him exactly upon this patronage proposition. I wish I did not have any of it. But the Philadelphia bar have asked for the passage of the bill, and I have asked a Republican Congress to pass the bill, and I would have asked a Republican President to fill the position.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Eleven minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] criticized me quite severely because I was not familiar with the details in reference to this matter. I plead guilty. Why should I know? Why should I be posted? Why should any Member of the House be posted on the subject of this bill or this rule? Since when did it become the policy in the House of Representatives, by a special rule, to call up what is almost a private bill, which never had been reported into the House or considered by a committee, to call it up without notice, for passage, and expect Members to know in regard to it?

I know a few other things that are not intimately connected with this proposition. One is that the Democrats in the Senate held up the appointment of two Federal judges in Chicago, where they were needed very much more than this one is needed in Philadelphia. They held up those appointments for a considerable period of time, and since Democrats in the Senate held up those appointments so long they are still held up by a Democratic President.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. MANN. I do.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I just wanted to state that they did the same thing in the State of Washington, where business was very much congested, even after the judge had assumed his duties.

Mr. MANN. Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] says that if this bill is considered in the House he will make the attempt to show the necessity for this judge, regardless of the illness of the present judge. I have no doubt that he will make that attempt.

I remember the Ohio case. We passed a bill to provide an additional judge, I think, in the southern or middle district of Ohio, with a provision that when one of the places became vacant it should not ever be filled. But when that place became vacant, if my recollection is correct, we passed another bill to provide an extra judge.

I opposed both of the propositions. I do not think there was any occasion in that case for the appointment of the extra judge.

Mr. PALMER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. PALMER. The gentleman from Illinois did not oppose the Maryland case.

Mr. MANN. I did not.

Mr. PALMER. And when Judge Morris died there was no attempt to put another judge on the bench?

Mr. MANN. No.

Mr. PALMER. Well, I will say to the gentleman——

Mr. MANN. Let me say a word now.

Mr. PALMER. I should like to complete my statement.

Mr. MANN. Before that bill passed we had a complete understanding between many Members of the House that there should be no effort and no attempt made when Judge Morris died to put anybody in his place, if we passed a bill providing for an extra judge through the balance of his term of life.

Mr. PALMER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. PALMER. Permit me to say that I am perfectly willing and anxious to enter into exactly the same kind of an understanding.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but the gentleman himself has not the power.

Mr. PALMER. Well——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is only one man in Congress, and while at present he may be the political boss of Pennsylvania—and I hope he is—and I hope he will continue so on the Democratic side, he might not.

Mr. PALMER. Well, if the gentleman will permit, the understanding in the case of Judge Morris was had, I suppose, with the gentleman who introduced the bill.

Mr. MANN. Oh, it was had with a good many gentlemen.

Mr. PALMER. I am satisfied that a good many gentlemen here would be willing to enter into that understanding, because nobody has any earthly notion of asking for an additional judge in Philadelphia.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman ought not to bring in a bill at this time of night without a chance for Members to know anything about it, and attempt to put it through in this way.

Mr. POU. Does not the bill itself provide that there shall be no appointment when a vacancy occurs?

Mr. MANN. It does; and that was the case in the Ohio matter. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania himself says that he will undertake to show to the House the need of three judges in this district where there are now only two. If he can show to the House now that they need three judges in the district, I fail to understand how he could enter into such an agreement fairly to himself that there shall be only two judges.

Mr. POU. Any agreement that might be entered into here would not be worth anything.

Mr. MANN. We discovered that in the last Congress when an agreement was entered into in regard to some international congress at Buffalo—and that is true of this Congress because the same provision was in the sundry civil bill—and then we discovered later that the agreement we entered into in regard to the California Exposition was good for nothing. In other words, gentlemen on the floor of the House who introduce bills and in good faith make statements are not able to carry them out, because they do not represent the sentiment of the people, and they are sidestepped, or perhaps they are retired from the Congress, and some one else carries it out. We had a distinct agreement on the floor as to the Buffalo Hygiene Congress, that there should be no appropriation asked for, and the gentleman who made the agreement kept it as far as he was concerned, but his colleague from the same city did not feel bound by the agreement and presented a case which secured an appropriation. He had it inserted at the other end of the Capitol and left in by the House conferees on the sundry civil bill, one of the conferees being subject to the influence of his colleague from the same State.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I am utterly surprised at the attitude of the gentleman from Illinois in this case.

Mr. MANN. The surprise is mutual.

Mr. HENRY. That may be true. When Justice Moody was stricken, Democrats of the Judiciary Committee, and every Democrat in this House, and every Republican on that side of the House, brought in a relief bill in order that that justice might retire on full pay, although he was not eligible under the general law.

The gentleman talks about being surprised in regard to this matter. A rule was introduced yesterday in this House, was referred to the Committee on Rules, and was taken up this morning, with his Republican colleagues sitting there and participating in the proceedings of the Rules Committee. They heard this case, and they thoroughly considered every phase of it and agreed to bring in a rule. It is a unanimous report of the Committee on Rules.

Now, if the gentleman from Illinois thinks that I am going to run to him every time I have an idea that I want to put something through this House—and he will be surprised if I do not—he will be entirely mistaken; nor do I think the gentlemen on that side ought to be required to do it. Here is a meritorious bill, and there ought to be no opposition to it. Every man on both sides of the House ought to be willing to vote for this bill to relieve a stricken judge, for it is a meritorious measure, introduced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Now, Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. LOGUE].

Mr. LOGUE. Mr. Speaker, being a practitioner in the eastern district of Pennsylvania, I can verify what my colleague, Mr. PALMER, has said. The work of the eastern district court is absolutely congested. We have a large volume of work there, many bankruptcy cases, a large civil trial list, and a large amount of equity business and criminal cases. At the present time, from my personal knowledge and acquaintanceship with the work of that court, it assures me that it is impossible for it to be kept in any way up to date.

I had occasion, a short time ago, to visit the home of Judge Holland, the town of Norristown, and from his friends there with whom I spoke I was assured of the fact that there was little hope of his recovery. His trouble at the present time is said to be tuberculosis. The man has performed his duty faithfully. He has served at times when he should have been relieved. He has given up only within the last few months, when absolutely compelled to do so and unable further to perform the duties. The bar of the eastern district, which embraces the member that my colleague has referred to, require it. Judge Witmer has been brought in from a distance to try an important conspiracy case—the lumber case. Other judges have been brought in to try cases that had to be disposed of. We need some one there who is able to devote all his time to this district, and not be limited to a judge of another district to help out the congestion. I know personally, from my experience and practice, of the necessity for this act, and have been urged by members of the bar, whose sole interest is not to fill a place, but to expedite and quickly clear up litigation, to urge its passage. In the interest of the administration of justice this should be done. I am perfectly satisfied that there will be no attempt to create a permanent additional judge out of this act.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOGUE. I do.

Mr. MOORE. I merely want to ask a question. Does the gentleman know whether Judge Witmer came in to try the lumber case to relieve Judge Holland?

Mr. LOGUE. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. That was the reason for it?

Mr. LOGUE. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. Does the gentleman know when Judge Holland left for the South?

Mr. LOGUE. In January Judge Holland left for the South. He became so sick there that he had to return to Norristown. I was in Norristown in a case the last week in March. I then met his son. From his statements regarding his father's condition it was manifest to me that Judge Holland had not improved.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama that a call of the House be ordered.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MANN) there were—ayes 64, noes 37.

So a call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. The roll call develops 192; not a quorum.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the Speaker be authorized to issue the warrant of the House for the arrest of the absentees.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that the Speaker be authorized to issue his warrant to arrest the absentees, and that the Sergeant at Arms arrest them and bring them into the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and eighteen Members have responded to their names—a quorum; 216 Members constitute a quorum.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Do 216 Members constitute a quorum?

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and sixteen Members constiute a quorum.

Mr. MANN. I thought the whole number was 434.

The SPEAKER. Four hundred and thirty-five Members constitute the whole membership of the House; but one is dead and three have never been sworn in.

Mr. MANN. Are their names carried on the roll?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know whether their names are carried on the roll or not. They ought not to be. This matter was in a good deal of doubt for a long time until Speaker Henderson rendered a very elaborate written opinion in which he defined what constitutes a quorum as being one more than a majority of Members elect sworn in and living who have neither resigned nor been expelled.

Mr. MANN. The Chair states there are three Members who have not been sworn in; their names ought to be stricken off the roll.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The Chair announced that 218 Members were present.

The SPEAKER. That is correct.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. So this question does not arise——

The SPEAKER. This question is not at all acute; we have two more than enough to constitute a majority.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The previous question has been ordered?

The SPEAKER. The previous question has been ordered and a call of the House was ordered, and the gentleman from Alabama——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be recorded as present.

The SPEAKER. That makes 219. The gentleman from Alabama moves to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the ayes had it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 53, noes 19.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois demands the yeas and nays. Those in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Nineteen gentlemen have risen, a sufficient number. The question is on dispensing with further proceedings under the call.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 167, nays 0, answered "present" 2, not voting 264, as follows:

YEAS—167.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, May 10, 1913.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, our heavenly Father, our hearts go out to Thee in gratitude for Thy goodness and for Thy wonderful works to the children of men. Especially do we thank Thee for the reflection of Thy love in the patient, tender, sweet, affectionate ministrations of mother, who on the morrow will receive the spontaneous tribute of love and respect poured out by thousands in her memory, a most potent factor in shaping the destiny of men and of nations. Surely "the hand that rocks the cradle rules the world." She was first to greet us when we came into life; she will be first to greet us when we pass from the endearing scenes of earth to the bright beyond; and as she ministered to our wants and taught us every manly virtue here, so she will lead us on to the nobler, grander things which await us there. As we wear the flower, token of her love and purity, so may we ever keep warm and pure her memory in our hearts, and all praise shall be Thine in Christ Jesus our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee on Appropriations from further consideration of House joint resolution 80, and consider the same in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to discharge the Committee on Appropriations from further consideration of House joint resolution 80 and put the same on its passage.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, when the House adjourned yesterday the previous question had been ordered on a resolution reported from the Committee on Rules. Is not that the unfinished business?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. PALMER. Would the consideration of this resolution by unanimous consent interfere with that?

The SPEAKER. Not at all.

Mr. PALMER. To be called up immediately after the disposition of this resolution?

The SPEAKER. No; not immediately. The gentleman from Virginia has a matter he wishes to dispose of.

Mr. MANN. The unfinished business can be called up any time when the regular order is demanded.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I want to call the Speaker's attention to a bill alluded to by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] yesterday, when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] suggested that it go over until this morning. It is a bill relating to an exposition at San Diego.

Mr. MANN. That is a matter of unanimous consent.

Mr. GARNER. I simply want to call attention to it before the regular order is demanded.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD], chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs in the last Congress, and probably to be in this, has a small matter that he wants disposed of. The rights of the gentleman from Pennsylvania will be preserved.

Mr. PALMER. I wanted to call attention to it because we had difficulty in getting a quorum yesterday and Members are leaving the city rapidly, and I do not want very much business to intervene.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read the resolution as follows:

House joint resolution 80.

Resolved, etc., That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to enable the Postmaster General to carry out effectively the provisions of sections 5 and 8 of the act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department, approved August 24, 1912, the following additional sums, being deficiencies for the service of the fiscal year 1913, namely:

For temporary and auxiliary clerks in post offices, $300,000.

For substitute, auxiliary, and temporary city delivery carriers, $200,000.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I understand the provisions of the resolution are for the purpose only of making appropriations for two items of $300,000 each, the necessity of which arises because of the large amount of business under the parcel-post law.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is due to two causes—section 5 of the Post Office bill, in relation to the 8-in-10 hour provision, and the other the parcel post.

The amount of business done since the establishment of the parcel-post system has been beyond all expectations. I have here correspondence from the Post Office Department which sets out the matter in full. The First Assistant Postmaster General states that unless this money be made available by the 15th of May it will be necessary to curtail the service, and it will be utterly impossible to handle the postal business that will accrue. It is the expectation that after the committees have been appointed, which I understand will be by the 1st of June, there will be a large number of matters which will require consideration and probably action by Congress, and that some time during the month of June the Committee on Appropriations will be required to report an urgent deficiency appropriation bill. This is a matter, however, for which provision must be made prior to that time unless there is to be some serious interference with the postal service.

I make this statement about an urgent deficiency bill because a large number of Members have called attention to matters which they believe require attention. This notice should be an assurance that there will be an effort to have considered a number of matters which it is believed are sufficiently urgent to be provided for at this session rather than to wait until the regular session in December.

Mr. MANN. What is the request of the gentleman at this time?

Mr. FITZGERALD. To consider this resolution in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and I ask, in connection with what I have said, to insert certain correspondence in the RECORD. When this matter was first called to my attention by the Post Office Department I suggested that perhaps the deficiencies might be in services in which the department was entitled under the law to incur a deficiency, and at my suggestion the department submitted to the Comptroller of the Treasury certain matters to ascertain whether deficiencies could be incurred. The Comptroller upon examination decided that it was not a matter for him to determine, but was a matter of law that should be referred to the Attorney General. The matter was referred to the Attorney General, and he decided that in these appropriations for services for which provision is to be made the department could not incur a deficiency without violating the law. It therefore became necessary to make immediate provision to maintain the service.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the Post Office appropriation act, which is referred to in this resolution, contained a provision authorizing the Postmaster General to readjust the contracts of star-route carriers. That was the only provision contained in the law authorizing a readjustment of existing contracts and increased contract payments. It was intended to meet the increased cost of carrying the star routes by reason of the establishment of the parcel post. I have not any doubt but that these items are necessary as deficiency items, and should be provided for at this time, but I want to ask the gentleman from New York whether he has taken into consideration the deficiencies that it will probably be necessary to provide for in the increased cost of the star-route service?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I have not given it any consideration, because the department has not made any suggestion about it. The star-route contract service, however, would be in a different category. If the department is authorized to make the contracts, the work would be performed and a deficiency might legally be incurred, in my opinion, under such a situation. This is for the employment of clerks and carriers, temporary and auxiliary, and, under the law, although the duty of rendering certain services is imposed upon the department, they must be rendered within the appropriations made for the purpose by Congress. A deficiency can not be incurred so as to create a liability in excess of the appropriations made by Congress.

Mr. MONDELL. Is it the gentleman's opinion that additional payments that may be required by reason of the readjustment of star-route contracts could be paid without incurring liability on the part of the authorities?

Mr. FITZGERALD. As long as they are authorized and are contract obligations, they will be certified to Congress and carried as a number of such items are.

Mr. MONDELL. I hope there is no doubt about it. There has been some doubt about it in the minds of the post-office officials. If there is any doubt, I hope they will communicate with the gentleman and inform him as to the necessity for deficiency appropriations.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have not examined the matter recently. I express my opinion. In any event the officials of the Post Office Department are apparently not alarmed about that situation. This is a situation that requires immediate attention. Otherwise within a very few days the accumulation of mail matter will become so great that the entire postal service will be congested.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman says they are not alarmed about it. I have discovered this. The gentleman uses the term "alarmed." I adopt his term. They do not seem to be so much disposed to become alarmed over a matter that affects the country districts as they do over a matter that affects city delivery or employees in the large offices. I suppose that is natural.

Mr. BARTLETT rose.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will allow me to continue. There has been in the minds of the officials of the department some question as to whether they have authority to incur a deficiency to make the payments that will become necessary under the provisions to which I have referred for increase of pay for star-route carriers. Whether or no they have finally concluded they have authority to do that, I do not know, but if they have not it will become necessary at an early date to make some provision with regard to it, and I am sure the gentleman from New York will make such a provision if the department calls it to his attention.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, replying to the suggestion of the gentleman from Wyoming, I know that the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General has taken up the matter in a number of instances in my own district, and I apprehend will be glad to do so at the request of the gentleman from Wyoming or any other gentleman, of having the mails on the star routes weighed.

They are being weighed now for the purpose of determining whether or not the compensation of the contractors who carry the mails on the star routes shall be increased by reason of the increased amount of mail carried growing out of the establishment of the parcel post. As the gentleman understands the carrying of star routes is a matter of contract fixed from time to time between the department and those who carry them, and if it shall appear, so I have been informed by the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General and informed before in several cases, from the weighing of the mail that the present compensation was not adequate with the burdens that have been increased by reason of the fact of the adoption of the parcel post going over star routes, then they would take steps looking to permitting a change of the contract by reason of that fact and allow additional compensation. I know from my own inquiries of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General that they are inquiring into that matter.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt about the fact that the department is proceeding to make the necessary inquiry and investigation under the provisions of law to which I have referred. I have conferred with the department officials a number of times in regard to it, and I am aware of the fact that they contemplate a reweighing.

Mr. BARTLETT. Not only contemplate it, but are doing it now.

Mr. MONDELL. I presume that the weighing is now under way, and when the reweighing is completed the probability is that as to a considerable number of contracts the Government will be found to be obligated for an additional sum by reason of the parcel post. The only question I had in mind was, Is the department authorized to meet this additional obligation by creating a deficiency without officials incurring liability under the law for so doing? The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], who is the highest authority in such matters, seems to think they have. I agree with him. I trust the sums found due will be paid promptly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. In my opinion, it being a contract obligation, the department will use the appropriation available to meet this obligation, as far as the appropriation will permit, and the balance due will be certified as an audited claim and carried in a deficiency bill as a matter of course. That is the usual course.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I am in entire accord with the purpose of the gentleman from New York; but in connection with the phraseology as carried in the appropriation act for this service I find the wording in this resolution is not in the same language. This phraseology is stereotyped in the Post Office appropriation bill, and I think it should be limited as limited in the appropriation act to clerks at first and second class offices, so as to read, "for temporary and auxiliary clerks at first and second class offices, $300,000." While we make provision under the law for allowances in the third-class offices, still it is not a direct appropriation for clerk hire, but as salary and allowance to postmasters. I have before me the Post Office acts of the respective years, and I think the phraseology should be limited to the language as contained there, so that the money could not be applied to any other purpose than that now authorized by law.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman will read the prior part of the joint resolution, it is:

To enable the Postmaster General to carry out effectively the provisions of sections 5 and 8 of the act making appropriations—

And so forth.

Mr. STAFFORD. Sections 5 and 8 refer to all post offices. That would refer to third-class and fourth-class post offices.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Five does not; the gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. STAFFORD. I can give the gentleman the phraseology as carried in the Post Office appropriation act.

Mr. FITZGERALD. "Section 5. After March 4, 1913, letter carriers in the City Delivery Service and clerks in first and second class post offices."

Mr. STAFFORD. That refers only to one branch of the resolution proposed by the gentleman. There is another purpose. Also section 8——

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is for the parcel post.

Mr. STAFFORD. That may occasion increased business at all classes of post offices.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is what I wish. In case it does, we want these substitute officers.

Mr. STAFFORD. It should be limited for clerk hire at first and second class offices.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is equivalent to an objection.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is to put this question for unanimous consent.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman demands the regular order, that is equivalent to an objection.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. As I understand the situation, the question before the House is a request for unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. That is it.

Mr. CARLIN. Now, the regular order is for the Speaker to put that request, as I understand it.

Mr. MANN. The demand for the regular order has always been held as equivalent to an objection.

The SPEAKER. This is not debatable. If the gentleman desires to object, let him object.

Mr. CARLIN. I do not want to object. I asked for the regular order, which I understood to be the request for unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I would like——

Mr. CARLIN. I do not understand he has the right to reserve the right to object when the regular order is demanded.

Mr. MANN. If the regular order is demanded, that is equivalent to an objection.

The SPEAKER. That is true, and if the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN] wants to object there is no power on earth to keep him from objecting.

Mr. CARLIN. I do not desire to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman should withdraw the demand for regular order, then.

Mr. CARLIN. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CARLIN. My recollection is that at the last session of Congress this question arose and the Speaker ruled that the regular order was for the Speaker to put the request for unanimous consent.

Mr. MANN. That was on a call of the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, I think, did rule that way, but the position of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is undoubtedly correct.

Mr. CARLIN. Then I withdraw the demand for the regular order if that is the case. This is simply the beginning of a filibuster——

The SPEAKER. There is no necessity for answering such a remark.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman have an objection to inserting, after the word "clerks," the words "for first and second class offices"?

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman offers such an amendment, I shall antagonize it. This resolution has been prepared by men who are familiar with the law and the work of the department, and this legislation is what is needed. Under the circumstances I can not accept the gentleman's suggestion.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman says it has been prepared by gentlemen who are familiar with it. May I inquire if it has been submitted to any member of the Post Office Committee?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; the chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads has seen it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] asks unanimous consent to publish certain correspondence in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The following is the correspondence referred to:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, April 30, 1913.

(Memorandum for Mr. FITZGERALD.)

Referring to your call this morning and your request for a brief of the points which were discussed in connection with the need for additional funds for the postal service under this bureau I beg to submit the following:

The appropriations for temporary and auxiliary clerk hire at first and second class offices and for auxiliary and temporary letter carriers will require additions of $300,000 each, or a total of $600,000, to maintain the service during the remainder of the current fiscal year.

The department's estimates for appropriations for the fiscal year 1913 did not take into consideration the establishment of the parcel-post service on January 1, 1913, and the 8-hour-in-10 law for clerks and carriers which became operative on March 4, 1913. To carry out the provisions of the eight-hour law Congress increased the department's estimate for temporary and auxiliary clerk hire by $500,000 and that for auxiliary and temporary letter carriers by $400,000, but no increase was made in these appropriations on account of the parcel-post service. However, the appropriation for auxiliary and temporary letter carriers has been supplemented by $200,000 by allotment from the appropriation of $750,000 made to carry out the provisions of the parcel-post law.

The appropriation of $850,000 for temporary and auxiliary clerk hire (which includes the increase of $500,000 to carry out the eight-hour law) has been exhausted. In readjusting the schedules of clerks to comply with the provisions of the eight-hour law it has been necessary to authorize $474,470 from the appropriation for temporary and auxiliary clerk hire, and in addition to allow 754 regular clerks from the appropriation for clerks at first and second class offices. On the basis of the reports so far received from postmasters of the amounts actually expended on account of the parcel-post service it is estimated that $200,000 has been expended for this purpose during the quarter ended March 31 last. It is only reasonable to assume that at least this sum will be required for the same purpose during the quarter ending June 30 next, and it is estimated that $100,000 additional will be required to provide for the normal growth of the service and for emergencies which can not be foreseen. Specific requests already received for allowances from this appropriation for the June quarter amount to $75,000.

The appropriation of $1,600,000 for auxiliary and temporary letter carriers, which was increased to $1,800,000 by an allotment of $200,000 from the parcel-post appropriation, was exceeded by more than $25,000 at the close of the March quarter. Owing to the inadequacy of the appropriation for regular letter carriers it has been necessary to authorize from the appropriation for temporary and auxiliary carriers the employment of temporary carriers at 30 cents an hour to meet the needs of the service. The estimate of $300,000 to supplement this appropriation is based on the reports of postmasters showing the amounts which will be required during the remainder of the fiscal year on account of the parcel-post service, to carry out the eight-hour law, and to provide for the ordinary needs of the service, augmented by $44,000 to provide temporary carriers at 30 cents an hour to fill vacancies on the regular force, for additions to the regular force, and to meet emergencies. In appointing temporary carriers at 30 cents an hour to fill vacancies on the regular force and as additions to the regular force it is the purpose of the department to utilize the small balance which will accumulate in the appropriation for regular carriers to pay for the overtime of regular carriers under the eight-hour law.

DANIEL C. ROPER,
First Assistant Postmaster General.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, May 6, 1913.

Hon. JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. FITZGERALD: I inclose a copy of a letter addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury by the Postmaster General to-day, recommending that a joint resolution be passed by Congress appropriating $300,000 for temporary and auxiliary clerks in post offices and $300,000 for substitute, auxiliary, and temporary city letter carriers, to be immediately available. These amounts are necessary for the administering of sections 5 and 8 of the postal-service act of August 24, 1912, during the remainder of the current fiscal year.

The question as to whether a deficiency could be incurred in these appropriations was submitted to the Comptroller of the Treasury for a decision, and he stated that it was a question of law that should be decided by the Attorney General, who informed the Postmaster General that no deficiency could be incurred. It will therefore be necessary to have a joint resolution passed by Congress, and owing to the exigencies of the case, may I ask that this matter receive your prompt attention.

Very truly, yours,

DANIEL C. ROPER,
First Assistant Postmaster General.

MAY 6, 1913.

Hon. WILLIAM G. MCADOO, Secretary of the Treasury.

SIR: Section 5 of the postal-service act of August 24, 1912, provides:

"That on and after March 4, 1913, letter carriers in the City Delivery Service and clerks in first and second class post offices shall be required to work not more than 8 hours a day: Provided, That the 8 hours of service shall not extend over a longer period than 10 consecutive hours, and the schedules of duty of the employees shall be regulated accordingly."

Section 8 of the same act made provision for the establishment of a general parcel-post service on January 1, 1913.

For the purpose of administering section 5, the estimate for temporary and auxiliary clerk hire submitted by the Post Office Department for the year 1913 was increased $500,000 and that for auxiliary and temporary carriers $400,000, but no increase was made in either of these appropriations for administering section 8.

The appropriations for temporary and auxiliary clerk hire and auxiliary and temporary carriers have not been sufficient to carry out the provisions of section 5 and to provide for the parcel-post service, and are exhausted. It is estimated that $300,000 additional will be needed in each of these appropriations to provide for the service during the remainder of this fiscal year.

In the opinion of the Attorney General a deficiency can not be incurred in these appropriations, and to avoid serious embarrassment to the service the department finds it necessary to ask Congress for additional funds to meet the immediate needs of the service.

It is therefore recommended that a joint resolution of Congress embodying the following draft of legislation be passed at the earliest possible date:

"To enable the Postmaster General to carry out effectively the provisions of sections 5 and 8 of the act approved August 24, 1912, making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $300,000 for temporary and auxiliary clerks in post offices and $300,000 for substitute, auxiliary, and temporary city delivery carriers, which shall be immediately available."

Owing to the exigencies of the case, may I ask that this matter receive your prompt attention.

Respectfully,

A. S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General.

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., May 7, 1913.

Hon. JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. FITZGERALD: With further reference to the request for a deficiency appropriation of $300,000 for auxiliary and temporary clerks in post offices and $300,000 for substitute, auxiliary, and temporary city delivery carriers, I have the honor to state that the act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1913, provides:

"SEC. 5. That on and after March 4, 1913, letter carriers in the City Delivery Service and clerks in first and second class post offices shall be required to work not more than 8 hours a day: Provided, That the 8 hours of service shall not extend over a longer period than 10 consecutive hours, and the schedules of duty of the employees shall be regulated accordingly. * * *

"That should the needs of the service require the employment on Sunday of letter carriers in the City Delivery Service and clerks in first and second class post offices, the employees who are required and ordered to perform Sunday work shall be allowed compensatory time on one of the six days following the Sunday on which they perform such service."

Section 8 of the same act provides for the establishment of a general parcel post on January 1, 1913.

The estimate submitted by the department for temporary and auxiliary clerk hire for the fiscal year 1913 was $350,000, and for substitute, auxiliary, and temporary city delivery carriers $1,200,000. For the purpose of administering section 5 the appropriation for temporary and auxiliary clerk hire for the fiscal year 1913 was increased $500,000, and that for substitute, auxiliary, and temporary city delivery carriers $400,000, but no increase was made for the purpose of administering section 8. Experience has demonstrated, however, that the increase in these appropriations was not sufficient even to provide for administering section 5, which is illustrated by the fact that it has required 754 additional clerks and $474,470 auxiliary service to place the 8-in-10-hour law for clerks into effect. In the city delivery unusual demands on account of the growth of the service have depleted the appropriation for auxiliary and temporary carriers, so that although increased by an allotment of $275,000 from the appropriation for parcel post, it is inadequate to provide for the increased force necessary to carry out sections 5 and 8.

The establishing of the parcel-post service required allowances from these appropriations that could not be anticipated at the time the act was passed. The cost for auxiliary and temporary clerk hire for this service for the March quarter amounts to $103,245, and all expenditures have not yet been reported. Allowances aggregating $176,790 have been made for the March quarter on account of the parcel-post service from the appropriation for auxiliary and temporary carriers. There are on file requests for allowances for auxiliary clerks amounting to $118,406 and for auxiliary carriers $240,000, which can not be acted upon until additional appropriations are secured, and based on the requests received it is estimated that at least $300,000 in each of these appropriations will be required to provide clerks and carriers to properly handle the mail until June 30.

Both of these appropriations are now exhausted, and allowances requested by postmasters, and in most instances representing expenditures already made, aggregating $358,406, await the immediate action of the department. Hence, unless additional funds are provided immediately it will be necessary forthwith to greatly embarrass the service by serious curtailments.

Very truly, yours,

DANIEL C. ROPER,
Acting Postmaster General.

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., May 9, 1913.

Hon. JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. FITZGERALD: Referring to my letter to you of the 7th instant, with regard to the urgent necessity for a deficiency appropriation to supplement the appropriations for auxiliary and temporary letter carriers and post-office clerks, I beg to call your attention to the fact that these appropriations are now completely exhausted, due to the department's efforts to carry out the provisions of sections 5 and 8 of the Post Office appropriation act, approved August 24, 1912. The expenditures actually made from these appropriations thus far, together with the allowances already authorized for the remainder of the present fiscal year, exceed the appropriations, and in addition there are now awaiting action by the department requests for allowances chargeable to these appropriations which aggregate $358,406. Unless, therefore, the additional appropriation of $600,000 is made immediately available, in order not to violate the law by exceeding the appropriations made by Congress, it will be necessary to cancel and take up the unexpended balances of allowances already authorized for this quarter and to make no further allowances. It will be necessary to take this action not later than the 15th instant, and as a result it will be utterly impossible to handle the mail in post offices or to deliver it in cities, and as a consequence there will be such a congestion as to completely demoralize the postal service and paralyze the business and social interests of the country.

Very sincerely,

A. S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of this House joint resolution.

Mr. MANN. Will it not have to be read for amendment?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution for amendment.

The Clerk read the resolution in full.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the House joint resolution.

The House joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FITZGERALD, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the resolution was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. MCKELLAR, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for three days, on account of illness.

ADDITIONAL DISTRICT JUDGE FOR EASTERN PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is to vote on the resolution brought in by the Committee on Rules. Those in favor of the resolution will say "aye"; those opposed, "no."

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 126, noes 53.

So the resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

Mr. MANN. What was the resolution that passed, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The resolution was to take up the bill. The Clerk will report the resolution for purposes of information.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That immediately after the adoption of this rule the House shall proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 32) to provide for the appointment of an additional district judge in and for the eastern district of Pennsylvania.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. This special rule simply provides for the immediate consideration of the bill, and the rules of the House provide that all such bills shall be considered in the Committee of the Whole. Does not this bill now have to be considered in Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. The resolution provides—

That immediately after the adoption of this rule the House shall proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 32) to provide for the appointment of an additional district judge in and for the eastern district of Pennsylvania.

The Chair is inclined to think that the point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is well taken.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, I do not know how the Chair is going to rule, but if he has in mind the sustaining of the point of order I would like to be heard for a minute.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman on the point of order.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has made a point of order or a suggestion which I presume he meant as a point of order.

Mr. MANN. I submitted a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. PALMER. Is the gentleman making a point of order?

Mr. MANN. There is no occasion to make a point of order. There is nothing to make a point of order on yet. I submitted a parliamentary inquiry so that if the Chair intimated or stated that it was necessary to go into the Committee of the Whole the gentleman from Pennsylvania would have the information, and then could move to go into Committee of the Whole; otherwise not.

Mr. PALMER. The gentleman's inquiry called for an expression from the Chair upon a matter of order.

I simply want to say in regard to that matter, Mr. Speaker, that this resolution simply provides that forthwith the House shall proceed to the consideration of the bill H. R. 32. The language of the rule, as I understand, follows the language of the rule which was brought into the House by the Committee on Rules for the consideration of an appropriation bill earlier in the session, at which time the Speaker submitted the bill to the House without going into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, where, in the absence of such a rule, the appropriation bill would have gone. It seems to me, under the language of the rule that the House shall proceed to the consideration of this bill, there can be no doubt that it must be considered in the House.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, has the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] finished?

Mr. PALMER. Yes.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, does not the rule specifically state that the House shall proceed to consider the bill in the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. ALEXANDER). That part of the rule has been stricken out.

Mr. HENRY. I know nothing about that. I have copied exactly the language of the resolution down to a certain point—down to the word "Pennsylvania." How is it stricken out?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The resolution is as follows:

That immediately after the adoption of this rule the House shall proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 32) to provide for the appointment of an additional district judge in and for the eastern district of Pennsylvania.

The words "in the House" have been stricken out.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, it ought not to be stricken out, because I did not strike it out. I will read from the resolution from which it was taken. House resolution 97 was introduced by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON], and it read as follows:

Resolved, That immediately after the adoption of this rule the House shall proceed to the consideration in the House of the bill (H. R. 32) to provide for the appointment of an additional district judge in and for the eastern district of Pennsylvania.

And there I stopped, precisely in the language of this resolution. It was so copied, and if the words "in the House" have been stricken out I know nothing about that. I do not charge that anybody has done it, but the resolution was written so as to make this a privileged bill. Such was the object.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I plead not guilty. I have never seen the paper.

Mr. HENRY. Why, certainly; I know you had nothing to do with it.

Mr. MANN. And I am very sure that I will plead not guilty for the reading clerks, that they did not strike it out. Probably the gentleman has had a moment when he forgot what he was doing.

Mr. HENRY. No.

Mr. MANN. The resolution which was read to the House, submitted to the House, and voted upon by the House was the resolution without the words "in the House."

Mr. HENRY. They were in it when I offered it.

Mr. MANN. It was not so reported to the House when it was originally read, and it was for that reason I asked to have it reported again this morning.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair calls attention to the resolution as printed in the RECORD.

Mr. HENRY. I ask unanimous consent that the pencil mark or pen mark striking out those words be erased, because those words should not be stricken out.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair calls attention to the RECORD of yesterday, as showing how the resolution was presented:

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Chairman, I submit the following privileged resolution from the Committee on Rules.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Resolved, That immediately after the adoption of this rule the House shall proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 32) to provide for the appointment of an additional district judge in and for the eastern district of Pennsylvania."

So it appears that the resolution as presented had those words stricken out.

Mr. HENRY. I do not doubt that it is in the RECORD that way, but that is not as I drew it and not as I offered it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Of course the Chair can only take the resolution as presented.

Mr. HENRY. I do not impeach anyone as having changed the resolution, but it was simply copied, and I ask unanimous consent that it be corrected so as to conform with the way it was drawn.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman did not present it that way, and of course he can not correct it. It has been passed by the House. A motion to reconsider is not in order. The gentleman can move to go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PALMER. I will get at it in a moment. Wait until I get a ruling on it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the present form of the resolution the Chair certainly holds that it is in order to move to go into Committee of the Whole. There is nothing on the face of the resolution to indicate to the Chair that this bill is to be considered in any other manner than in the ordinary way under the rules.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Connecticut objects.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 32.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Pending that, I ask unanimous consent that the general debate be limited to 40 minutes, 20 minutes on a side.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union on the bill H. R. 32, and pending that the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] asks unanimous consent that the debate on the bill be limited to 40 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

PANAMA CALIFORNIA EXPOSITION.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Pennsylvania object to my asking unanimous consent to dispose of a bill that I think will take only a minute? If it takes longer, I will withdraw it.

Mr. PALMER. Pending my motion.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Pending that, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 4234) providing certain legislation for the Panama California Exposition, to be held in San Diego, Cal., during the year 1915.

Mr. MANN. To consider it in the House?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; to consider it in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to require the Panama California Exposition Co., of San Diego, Cal., to deposit with a depository, to be named by the Secretary of the Treasury, such sum or sums of money as in the discretion of the Secretary shall be necessary to cover awards, medals, certificates, prizes, and premiums, and all other obligations incurred by said corporation with exhibitors at the Panama California Exposition, which money shall be held by said depository as a pledge to the United States Government for a faithful fulfillment of the above obligations; or the Secretary of the Treasury may, in lieu of such cash pledge, accept a good and sufficient bond from said exposition company, to be approved by him and conditioned for the faithful performance of every liability or obligation incurred by said exposition company in respect to exhibitors at said exposition, to be held in San Diego, Cal., during the year 1915.

SEC. 2. That all articles that shall be imported from foreign countries for the sole purpose of exhibition at the Panama California Exposition upon which there shall be a tariff or customs duty shall be admitted free of the payment of duty, customs fees, or charges, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe; but it shall be lawful at any time during the exposition to sell, for delivery at the close thereof, any goods or property imported for and actually on exhibition in the exposition buildings or on the grounds, subject to such regulations for the security of the revenue and for the collection of import duties as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe: Provided, That all such articles when sold or withdrawn for consumption or use in the United States shall be subject to the duty, if any, imposed upon such articles by the revenue laws in force at the date of withdrawal; and on such articles which shall have suffered diminution or deterioration from incidental handling and necessary exposure, the duty, if paid, shall be assessed according to the appraised value at the time of withdrawal for consumption or use, and the penalties prescribed by law shall be enforced against any person guilty of any illegal sale, use, or withdrawal.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that this is the usual form of a bill that is passed where an exposition is held. The bill is before the Ways and Means Committee and could be reported by that committee, but the committee, of course, has been engaged several weeks in the consideration of a tariff bill and did not have a chance to consider it. The emergency arises because if it is not considered to-day it will have to go over until the 1st of June, and the Brazilian Government want to start their building and bring their artisans in to build it. They can do so under the general law of the United States when the exposition is recognized by the Government, but they can not do it until it is recognized. This is merely the usual resolution for awarding the medals, and it operates as a recognition of the exposition and then the general statute applies and enables them to start work at once. That is the only emergency in the case. They are anxious to get it up. The bill has been before the committee, and I have been somewhat derelict, but I could not help it, because I was engaged in the House.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I shall not object to the consideration of the bill or its passage, although I doubt very much if the bill in all its parts is a privileged bill, even if it had been reported by the Committee on Ways and Means. I call attention to the fact that the bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to require the exposition company to deposit a sum of money with the Secretary of the Treasury or with a depository. I do not believe that we have the power to require this company, which is a private organization, without any authority from the General Government, to deposit any funds at all. But, as I understand it, the company desires the legislation, and while I do not think it is a very good precedent, I shall make no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. ALEXANDER). Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE ON EDUCATION.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution 82.

Resolution authorizing the President to accept an invitation to participate in an international conference on education.

Resolved, etc., That the President is hereby authorized to accept an invitation extended by the Netherlands Government to the Government of the United States to participate by delegates in an international conference on education to be held at The Hague in the year 1913: Provided, That no appropriation shall be granted at any time for expenses of delegates or other expenses incurred in connection with said conference.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman from Virginia if this resolution has been submitted to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], who is likely to be the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes; it was submitted to him.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] is likely to be chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I hope so.

Mr. MANN. I understand both gentlemen understand that there is to be no appropriation under this resolution?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The resolution provides that there shall be no appropriation.

Mr. MANN. I am not asking about that. We have had so many examples where a resolution provided for no appropriation, but gentlemen had their fingers crossed when it was passed. [Laughter.]

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I do not think that the Committee on Appropriations or the Committee on Foreign Affairs would report an appropriation after the adoption of this resolution.

Mr. MANN. I do not suppose they would, but I thought likely that at some time or other the distinguished body at the other end of the Capitol might insert a provision in one of the appropriation bills which would be agreed to in conference.

Mr. FITZGERALD. So far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, there will be no such agreement. I think it would be well that the President should understand that if it is approved by him it is to be lived up to, and in good faith.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. If I should represent the Committee on Foreign Affairs, I would not agree in conference to an appropriation after the adoption of this resolution.

Mr. MANN. Gentlemen will remember that at the last session the President of the United States, considering the matter so important, sent a message to Congress declaring that Congress ought not in any case to authorize him to accept an invitation to participate in these international conventions unless Congress intended to provide the necessary money to take care of the delegates.

I do not know whether the present President will have the same influence in the future brought to bear upon him that President Taft had, but the influence was strong enough on President Taft to get him to send a special message to Congress upon the subject.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, in this case the necessary money to defray the expenses of this conference has already been raised and has been deposited for this purpose, and there could scarcely be any occasion for these delegates to ask for an appropriation.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman has every reason to believe that there will be no appropriation asked?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I do not think there is any prospect that they would ask for an appropriation. If they do, they certainly will not get it.

The occurrences which make this resolution necessary are as follows:

On March 12, 1912, the Acting Secretary of the Interior, at the suggestion of the Commissioner of Education, requested the Department of State to ascertain from the Netherlands Government whether it would be agreeable to that Government to have the conference meet at The Hague in the fall of 1912, and, if so, whether the Netherlands Government would be willing to invite the participation of the Governments in the conference. Attention was called to the fact that no special appropriation by Congress would be needed to insure participation by this Government, and that a sum of money sufficient to cover clerical and other incidental expenses had been offered by private parties.

On March 19, 1912, the Acting Secretary of State advised the Secretary of the Interior that the American minister at The Hague was instructed to make informal inquiry regarding the matter.

On June 19, 1912, the Secretary of State advised the Secretary of the Interior that in a dispatch, No. 75, of May 29, 1912, the American minister reports that the Netherlands Government will have no connection with the proposed conference, and that it would not be consistent to send invitations requesting other Governments to be represented, on account of another conference on that date.

On July 15, 1912, the Secretary of State forwarded to the Secretary of the Interior dispatch No. 80, of June 26, 1912, from the American minister, stating that the Netherlands Government agrees in principle to the calling of the conference, but suggests that for reasons stated it is deemed preferable to fix another date, and requests that the program of the proposed conference be forwarded.

On December 10, 1912, the Secretary of the Interior informs the Secretary of State that the inquiries of the Netherlands Government regarding program and method of financing the proposed conference were fully answered in person by Mrs. Fannie Fern Andrews, special collaborator of the Bureau of Education, who visited The Hague in October and November, 1912, and had several conferences with the minister of foreign affairs. Suggests that the conference be held during August or September, 1913. Advises that the sum of $5,000 for the expenses of the conference will be at once deposited by Mrs. Andrews with the State Department for transmittal to the Netherlands Government.

On December 14, 1912, Mrs. Fannie Fern Andrews sent to the State Department a check for $5,000 for transmission to the Netherlands Government for the expenses of the conference.

On February 4, 1913, Secretary of State forwarded to the Secretary of the Interior an invitation from the Netherlands Government to the Government of the United States to participate by official delegates in an international conference on education to be held at The Hague, September, 1913.

On February 11, 1913, Interior Department advises Secretary of State that matter has been referred to Commissioner of Education and will forward names of persons who may be recommended for appointment as official delegates.

On March 15, 1913, Interior Department recommends that the Government of the United States formally accept invitation and forwards tentative list of topics for program.

On March 27, 1913, Acting Secretary of State advises Secretary of Interior that by reason of a provision in the deficiency act approved March 4, 1913, this Government is prohibited from accepting an invitation to participate in any international congress, conference, or like event without first having specific authority of law to do so.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FLOOD of Virginia, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed was laid on the table.

ADDITIONAL DISTRICT JUDGE FOR EASTERN PENNSYLVANIA.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 32) to provide for the appointment of an additional district judge in and for the eastern district of Pennsylvania.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 32, with Mr. HAY in the chair.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Chairman, this bill was discussed at some length in the House yesterday afternoon when the rule was brought in from the Committee on Rules providing for its consideration. However, as there are doubtless many Members here to-day who did not hear that discussion, I will briefly repeat some of the things which were then said.

This bill is a bill to authorize the President to appoint a district judge for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, and it contains a provision in section 2—that whenever a vacancy shall occur in the office of the district judge for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, senior in commission, such vacancy shall not be filled, and thereafter there shall be but two district judges in said district.

The explanation of the bill lies in the fact that in the eastern district of Pennsylvania at the present time we have two district judges, one of whom is entirely incapacitated by reason of his physical condition from the performance of services upon the bench. Those two judges are Judges Thompson and Holland. Judge Holland is suffering from an incurable disease, and has been obliged to give up his work upon the bench. He has not been able to sit in the trial of cases for many months, and, as was stated here yesterday, though it is a difficult and delicate statement to say, it is nevertheless the cold, hard truth that his condition is such that none of his friends or associates or medical advisers has any hope whatever that he will be able to return to the bench. This proposition, therefore, is to permit the President to appoint a judge upon this bench to relieve the court in its present congested state of business, and when a vacancy occurs, senior in commission—that is to say, when Judge Holland retires from any cause—the vacancy created by his retirement is not to be filled, so that there will continue to be in the future as in the past two judges in this district.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMER. Yes.

Mr. HAMLIN. I believe there are now about 98 district judges in the United States, and I think fully half of them do not work over half of the time. Why could not one of them be detailed to clear up that docket over there?

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Chairman, I would say to the gentleman that outside judges have been detailed to help clear up the docket. They have been sitting there a great deal, but they have not been able to get outside judges there for a sufficient length of time to anywhere near catch up with the business. That is the same question which the Committee on the Judiciary, at the time this bill was before it, put to Judge Gray, who is a judge in that circuit. He explained how it was impossible to get enough services from judges in that section or anywhere else to keep this work down. The business of the circuit is rapidly growing. It is one of the largest in the country. New Jersey, of course, is in this circuit, and with the recent prosecutions there the business has been very largely increased. They have tried their best to keep this work down in the way suggested by the gentleman from Missouri, and all of the judges on the bench say it is not a sufficient remedy.

Mr. HAMLIN. It seems to me that with the great number they have to draw from they could do it. Under this bill you intend to create an additional judge.

Mr. PALMER. Well, you can not compel these judges to come down there to sit and you can not go out of the circuit to get them. Judge Gray says he has worked upon the problem, he has given a good deal of attention to it, he has got others to help, but still he could not get the relief the court requires. The judge must be from the same circuit, as the gentleman knows, in order to appear in the court.

Mr. HAMLIN. I understand, but there are quite a few even there.

Mr. PALMER. There are quite a few, but it is quite a busy circuit at that.

Mr. HAMLIN. I do not like the idea of making new offices and having a funeral before a man dies.

Mr. PALMER. I do not either, Mr. Chairman. I would not create any additional judgeship; I am not in favor of that. I am in favor, however, of having the business of a great district done by giving the people of that district as many judges as they have had for many years past. There is no gainsaying what this proposition is. Judge Holland has been a faithful public servant. He has been upon the bench for a great many years, and before that was United States attorney. He is a man of comparatively small means; has not been able to earn money because he has been giving the best days of his life to the service of his country upon the bench. It is a question of time when his physical condition will be such that he can not work at all. He has not the means to permit him to retire without pay. He is not old enough to retire under the statute with pay, and this proposes simply to give the people of that district their two judges until Judge Holland retires or until he can come back to work.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PALMER. I yield to my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE. Assuming that the facts are correctly stated by the gentleman as to the health of Judge Holland, would the gentleman consent to an amendment to his bill in the nature of a substitute for section 2 providing for the retirement of the judge senior in commission? I have drawn one here which seems to me to meet the question which the gentleman has just dilated upon and which seems to meet the delicate situation which confronted us last night. My amendment would provide:

That immediately after the passage of this act the district judge for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, senior in commission, shall be retired without abatement of pay.

Mr. PALMER. I will say this to the gentleman. I have, as he has, the highest regard for Judge Holland. I would not do anything to injure him or to hurt him. I was obliged to say here yesterday, for the information of the House, as I am obliged to say to-day, that in my judgment he never can get well, but it is one of the symptoms of the peculiar malady under which he is suffering that he believes that he is going to get back to work. The gentlemen of the House know to what I refer. It is the most common symptom of the disease that the patient is confident that he is going to get well. Judge Holland is not asking to be retired; he wants to work.

Mr. MOORE. That is true.

Mr. PALMER. And I would hate to volunteer to retire him from the bench when he does not want to go.

Mr. MOORE. Let me call the gentleman's attention to the phraseology of his bill, section 2, "that whenever a vacancy shall occur in the office," and so forth. It is specific in the third line in its application to the "judge senior in commission." That might be interpreted to apply to a future situation.

Mr. PALMER. It might apply to retirement for any cause.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to say in reply to the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] that the bill in this case follows the precedents in like cases, and that the suggestion that the gentleman makes is entirely a new departure in legislation affecting district judges. The cases where a judge who has not reached the age of 70 years and who has not sat upon the bench for at least 10 years, the two facts concurring, I may say the only cases in the history of the country where a judge has been allowed to retire under such special legislation was the case of Mr. Justice Hunt, of the Supreme Court of the United States, and then recently, as many of us here will remember, Mr. Justice Moody, of the Supreme Court of the United States; but no such legislation as that was ever had with respect to the retirement of district judges.

Legislation like that proposed in this bill has abundant precedents. For instance, I can recall several of them that have happened since my service on the Committee on the Judiciary. I recall the case of Judge Ricks, of Ohio, and the case of Judge Rector, of Texas, and the case of Judge Morris, of Maryland. In each one of those cases a bill was passed which I think was identical in phraseology with this bill. At least that is my recollection. It provided, just as this bill provides, that whenever a vacancy shall occur in the office of the district judge for the particular district then sought to be legislated about, the senior in commission, such vacancy shall not be filled, and that thereafter there shall be but two district judges in said district. So we are following the legislative precedents, and I think that the measure now proposed and pending before the House is better than that suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE]. And I think it is less cruel to Judge Holland to offer it in this form than in the form suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield for one question? The gentleman is satisfied, then, that this section 2 applies specifically to the judge senior in commission in this instance only, and would not apply to any other judge, senior in commission, after the present emergency had passed?

Mr. CLAYTON. Undoubtedly, that is my opinion.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Chairman, this bill was introduced in the Sixty-second Congress. It was considered by the Committee on the Judiciary, and it was the unanimous opinion of that committee that it should be reported favorably and passed. Unfortunately, however, Judge Holland's condition became acute, so that it was known positively that he could not return to the bench, so late during the last session of the Sixty-second Congress that when the Judiciary Committee had had its hearing and determined upon the matter business in the House was in such a state that we could not hope to have the bill passed. The creation of this judgeship, if you may call it so, is asked by the unanimous opinion of the bench and bar of Philadelphia, and it is asked solely on account of Judge Holland's condition and because of the business before the court requiring a strong man to sit on that bench, and with no notion whatever of any permanent increase of the number of judges in that district court.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] yesterday voiced a suspicion that seems to be lurking in his mind, that once this temporary judgeship should be created, when a vacancy did occur there would be an effort made to make the judgeship permanent. I called his attention to the fact that in the Judge Morris case the same kind of a law had been passed, and upon Judge Morris's death no attempt was made to increase the size of the bench in that district. I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] supported that bill with that understanding. He challenged my right or my power to make any such understanding in this matter, and therefore I have brought here to-day the resolutions adopted by the committee on judicial vacancies of the Law Association of the City of Philadelphia, at a meeting held February 11, 1913. The law association is the bar association of that city. They say:

Whereas at the present time in the eastern district of Pennsylvania there is an absolute necessity, in consequence of the great pressure of business, for the constant attendance of two district judges; and
Whereas the condition of the business in the other districts of the third circuit is such that it is almost impossible to secure the attendance of a judge from another district; and
Whereas Judge Holland's indisposition makes it impossible for him to give that constant attendance which for so many years he did give to the business of the court with great satisfaction to the bar: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we would regard the resignation of Judge Holland at the present time as not being in the interest of the public.

Resolved further, That we most earnestly urge the creation of a third district judgeship for this district, with a proviso that, in case of the death or retirement of the senior in commission, such vacancy shall not be filled, and that thereafter there shall be but two district judges in said district.

Resolved further, That a copy of these resolutions be signed by all the members of the committee, to be forwarded to the chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives.

The character and standing of the men who signed these resolutions are an absolute assurance to the Congress of the United States that thereafter when a vacancy senior in commission shall happen there shall be but two district judges in said district.

This is signed, Mr. Chairman, first, by John G. Johnson, than whom there is no greater lawyer or more high-minded gentleman at the bar in America. It is also signed by Charles E. Morgan; John Hampton Barnes; Frank C. Pritchard, vice chancellor law association; Samuel Dickson; Henry P. Brown; Alfred Moore; George Pepper; Dimner Beeber; William A. Glasgow, jr.; Hampton L. Carson, formerly attorney general of Pennsylvania; Alexander Simpson, jr.; Joseph de F. Junkin; Ernest L. Tustin; Francis Fisher Kane; James Collin Jones; George Wentworth Carr; and F. B. Bracken.

These gentlemen are leaders of the Philadelphia bar. They are the officers of the Philadelphia Bar Association, and they have solemnly resolved and sent their resolutions here to be filed with the Committee on the Judiciary in favor of this bill, and to provide that after a vacancy shall occur there shall be but two judges in that district.

Mr. HULINGS. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. PALMER. I will yield.

Mr. HULINGS. How long has this disability of Judge Holland's continued?

Mr. PALMER. He has been a very sick man for several years, and he has been upon the bench when his friends and the members of the bar appearing in the court believed he ought not to be there. But for many months he has been unable to do anything whatever.

Mr. HULINGS. Well, now, has the business in that district in consequence of his disability been appreciably dammed up and accumulated?

Mr. PALMER. It certainly has.

Mr. HULINGS. Have you any facts as to that point?

Mr. PALMER. Yes. At the hearing before the Committee on the Judiciary upon this bill in February last there was present a large committee of the Philadelphia bar, and in addition to that Judge John B. McPherson, of that circuit, and Judge George Gray, of that circuit court. These gentlemen agree, not only as to Judge Holland's unfortunate condition, but also as to the necessity of having another judge upon the bench in the district at this time, and as Judge McPherson is probably more familiar with the situation than any other man, I want to refer to what he says upon that very subject. He says:

In 1903, at the time when the new district judgeship was asked for, the judges, both the district and circuit judges, who of course at that time did a good deal of district work, were actually engaged in court disposing of cases 189 days. In 1908, five years later, two district judges were in court, engaged in disposing of cases 398 days, and during the year ending July 1, 1912, owing to Judge Holland's illness, there was only one judge available, and the judges were upon the bench 333 days during that time, Judge Holland being practically incapacitated altogether, so that it was almost entirely the work of one judge. That, as you will see, amounted to being in court practically every business day of the year.

The amount of judgments is an indication of the increasing business. In 1903 it was about $650,000, in 1908 it was about $1,700,000, and in 1912 it was over $1,900,000. The business that the judges are asked to do is this: Civil trials before a civil jury, 16 weeks; that means 8 weeks for each judge; criminal trials about the same number of weeks, depending upon the length of the calendar. Then there are eight argument periods during the year, varying in length, of course, depending upon the amount of business, but it will suffice to say that it requires at least a week for each of those periods.

Then during each week there are at least 3 regular motion days, when the court sits and disposes of any business that may come before it, not deemed of sufficient importance to go upon the regular list; but those are sometimes prolonged until half a day is taken up in the disposition of a motion.

Then there is another matter which is now of very considerable importance. That is the naturalization business. In Philadelphia, unfortunately, the judges of the State courts refuse to naturalize, so that all of the business is in the Federal courts. Now, in 1903 the district courts heard and granted 1,725 applications. In 1912 the number had nearly doubled—3,250—and it is to be remembered that by the act of 1906 the time of these hearings has been increased one-third, because there are now two witnesses to be heard, whereas under the prior statute one only was heard. One lawyer informs me that applications are being filed much more rapidly than heretofore, and that in a short time it will take nearly a year before an applicant can be heard.

Then there is another matter—the bankruptcy business—in the interest of speedily disposing of the bankruptcy business. There has never been a fixed time for the hearing of bankruptcy cases. The custom has been to have the clerk keep a list of such cases, and whenever there were half a dozen, or something like that, the court would fix a special time to hear them. It takes certainly twice as long now to dispose of bankruptcy business as it did in 1908, for not only has the number of applications increased over 25 per cent more now than they were in 1903, but the questions to be decided are more numerous, and can not be, as the act contemplates, disposed of speedily.

Now, he adds that he, in trying to keep the business down, as I have stated, sent for these other judges, got them on the bench as frequently as he was able to, and still the business accumulates. I am told by the bar that Judge Thompson, the associate of Judge Holland, has not taken a day's vacation for a couple of years. He has been constantly at work, sitting in court day after day and working at night; and the same thing is practically true of Judge McPherson.

Mr. Chairman, if there ever was a case where relief ought to be granted to a judicial district, it is this; temporary relief only, at most, I am sorry to say, because I recognize that this is but for a very short time, and my consideration for Judge Holland makes me regret to say that. But there never was a case where there was better reason for Congress to help out a great judicial district than in this case.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, I regretted yesterday to see that this House was making judicial appointments a matter of partisan politics. The only question should be, Does the public service require another judge? It seems to me that the whole case is concluded by the statements of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER]. If his statements are facts—and I believe them to be facts—this bill ought to pass. A matter of this kind should not enter into the field of partisan politics at all.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman how many district judges there are now in the United States?

Mr. PALMER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] informs me that the number is 98.

Mr. CLAYTON. About that.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, this is a position that carries $7,000 a year, and it means for life. There are 98 of them. Where there is a death of one of them now a whole State gets along without the position being filled.

A very timely suggestion was made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN]—could not some other judge fill that position under the circumstances? Fill it? Yes, Mr. Chairman. You could dispense with 25 of them and still have a sufficient number to perform the duties of these positions.

Let us see what it amounts to. More than three-quarters of the cases, I repeat to the gentleman from Pennsylvania or any other legal gentleman, more than three-quarters of the cases brought to the district courts are for violations of the internal-revenue laws. Some inspector or special officer marching through some town picks up a few tobacco clerks or tobacco-store proprietors and hales them before the court for failing to scratch an internal-revenue stamp. Then there are whisky cases, and 'twixt all these statute-made crimes 75 per cent of the cases are furnished. Now notice the persistency and determination with which this matter is pushed, throwing aside all fair procedure, to bring about this legislation to get another judge appointed. Why did it not come through the regular channel, with due notice, so that every Member could come here and take part? But no; as in all cases of a similar character, they have to resort to the proceedings which we have seen here. Now let us see. Suppose it had been the case of a mere manufacturer, and he had pleaded for a few moments' consideration, would he have gotten it? I submit to you gentlemen that he would not.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to make the point that there is no quorum present. I am entitled to have a quorum listen to me when I am talking, and there is no quorum here.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut raises the point of no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and forty-one Members, a quorum of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I feel it a duty to Judge Holland that I should make a brief statement with regard to this matter. If the bill could be so framed that it would provide for his retirement, it would be much more satisfactory to me; but if the gentlemen on the other side who are in control do not consent to that change, I shall not oppose the bill as it is drawn.

The facts as stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] are essentially true. Judge Holland has been a very ill man for some time past. For four or five years he has been ailing, but with a devotion and a persistence most commendable he has been performing his duties upon the bench and at chambers. He was unable a few months ago to undertake the trial of a great conspiracy case that occupied three or four weeks, and a judge from the middle district had to be brought in to relieve him; but he was at chambers as late as last week. Judge Holland does not believe that he is so sick as others believe him to be, and, like all men who are ill and have a devotion to their duty and a desire not to be unduly crowded into the grave, he feels that he will recover. That is the delicate part of this whole situation. That the business of the court is crowded is confirmed by inquiries that I have made over the phone this morning from those in Philadelphia who are well posted and who know. There is a rush of business, the calendar is full, and but one judge is sitting and able to transact the business. The fact that Judge Holland appeared at chambers last week does not indicate that he was able to take his position upon the bench, but that he is hopeful that he will be restored to health is true.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE. Certainly.

Mr. SLOAN. Has the gentleman any assurance that if the bill is passed and a judge appointed that he might in a reasonable time be confirmed? Is it not about as bad to have a congestion in the Senate as in the courts? I refer especially to the judgeship in the State of Washington and of the Chicago district.

Mr. MOORE. I understand the gentleman's question. I do not want in this instance to impute to gentlemen in charge of the bill any political motives. That the appointee, if the bill passes, will be a Democrat goes without question, and I think it is entirely fair, in view of what happened during the last campaign, that a Democrat should be appointed.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE. I will.

Mr. COX. There are four members of the Commerce Court that will be abolished unless an appropriation is made between now and the 1st of July. What is going to be done with those four members of the court? Can the gentleman tell the House?

Mr. MOORE. I have not the slightest idea.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman know of anything in the law or the Constitution which would prevent one of the members of that court from being detailed to do this work?

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman from Indiana is a good constitutional lawyer, and I am no lawyer at all. He is better versed on those questions than I am. Whether it will be possible to detail a justice of the Commerce Court after his term of office has expired I do not know, and I do not know whether his services would be available or not.

Mr. COX. I have not looked up the question, but I remember of reading in the RECORD where able lawyers in the Senate investigated it last winter and arrived at the conclusion that while Congress had the power to practically abolish the court by refusing to appropriate money to run the machinery, yet at the same time it could not cut the judges out of their salary.

Mr. MOORE. The question was raised, and I think there is a serious question as to whether we can cut them out of their salaries.

Mr. COX. I know that was the opinion of some able lawyers in the Senate.

Mr PALMER. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will yield, I would like to answer the gentleman's suggestion.

Mr. MOORE. I yield.

Mr. PALMER. Under the law, as I understand it, the judges of the Court of Commerce could be assigned to other work as circuit judges by the Supreme Court of the United States, so that there would be no way of controlling their coming to the relief of this circuit. Besides that, a circuit judge does not sit in a district court for the trial of cases as the judge who is incapacitated has been doing. I think that was the intent and probably the language of the act establishing the Commerce Court, which led the judges to be assigned to circuit-court work.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMER. I have not the floor.

Mr. MOORE. I yield.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman from Indiana will consider that he has not yet had his question answered. When I take the floor I will endeavor to answer it.

Mr. PALMER. Of course, the gentleman from Illinois knows a great deal more than I do, and I would be glad to have the gentleman from Illinois answer the question if he can.

Mr. MANN. I was not criticizing the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I am sorry that he thinks I was. I was going to take the question up when I made some further remarks to the House.

Mr. COX. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will yield further——

Mr. MOORE. I do.

Mr. COX. I would like to ask him this question: Whether or not there is anything in the law now in force governing the assignment or detailing of circuit judges to sit with other circuit judges throughout the United States that would prevent the members of the Commerce Court from being detailed to sit in the trial of a case in the district court?

Mr. MOORE. I think it is a safe answer to the gentleman's question to say that that question has not yet been determined. It has been raised, and it might be raised in this particular instance. I did raise it in a small way with the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] a little while ago, when I suggested that possibly the appointment of a new judge here might mean that the bill as written would cover cases of judges in the future as well as in the present instance, but the gentleman from Alabama, who is a good lawyer, thought it would not, and applied only to this case. Now, Mr. Chairman, the facts, as I said a moment ago, are as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] has stated them in regard to the urgency of a second judge upon this bench. We have been deprived for a short period of the services of this judge, who is sick. That politics are behind this proposition I am not prepared to assert. That a partisan or Democrat would be appointed is to be expected, in view of the political complexion of the administration, and with that I have no fault to find. We do not complain of judges in our district or city because they belong to one party or another. We believe that once appointed to the bench, whether the man is Republican or Democrat, he will determine cases judicially on the evidence as brought before him; but the real question here is whether we shall gently retire this judge without his consent, or whether we shall boldly appoint some one over his head on the ground that he is a sick man and unable to perform his duties. I would prefer to have the retirement plan; but if the gentlemen do not consent to that, although this judge may live for many years, 10, 12, or 15—he believes he will get well, as I said—if the gentlemen prefer not to enter upon the retirement plan now, in view of the precedent it might establish, I am satisfied to vote for this bill as it is, with the understanding, of course, that it does not retire without pay this judge, who is faithful, who is desirous of performing his duty, and whose tenure has not expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think on the whole that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] has made out a pretty good case, and that if any additional judge is to be provided anywhere he might properly be provided in this case. I appreciate facts, and I think we must all appreciate the fact that is made known to us here, that one of the present judges through physical ailment ought not to be asked to perform the ordinary duties of a judge, at least all of the time, and that the amount of business in the district probably requires the services of more than one judge. Nor do I object to the form of the bill, which provides that practically upon the death of the present senior district judge the vacancy caused by his death shall not be filled. That is what I understand the bill to mean.

But, after all, Mr. Chairman, I do not see any necessity at this time for providing any new Federal judges. The Commerce Court consists of five circuit judges. There is one vacancy in that court, which the President can fill at any time by appointment, at least before the court is abolished. There are four circuit judges—circuit judges at large—under the act of Congress providing for them, subject to assignment now by the Supreme Court to work in any circuit of the United States, and when one of them is assigned in any circuit court the law further provides that the senior circuit judge of the circuit may assign any of these circuit judges to work in the district court.

Mr. PALMER. Of the circuit—may assign a circuit judge of the circuit.

Mr. MANN. May assign one of these circuit judges who is assigned in the circuit.

Mr. PALMER. I have the Judicial Code before me, but I would not, of course, undertake to correct the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. I am quite willing to be corrected if the gentleman has the information.

Mr. PALMER. All I was relying upon in the suggestion I made to the gentleman was the eighteenth section of chapter 1 of the Judicial Code, which provides:

SEC. 18. Whenever, in the judgment of the senior circuit judge of the circuit in which the district lies, or of the circuit justice assigned to such circuit, or of the Chief Justice, the public interest shall require, the said judge, or associate justice, or Chief Justice, shall designate and appoint any circuit judge of the circuit to hold said district court.

Mr. MANN. Yes; I drew that provision exactly as it reads in the law by amendment on the floor of the House.

Mr. PALMER. The Commerce Court judges are circuit judges.

Mr. MANN. Yes; and may be assigned to any circuit, and when they are so assigned under the law they are judges of that circuit. That provision was not in the judicial title act as it was presented to the House from the Committee on Revision of the Laws, and the language of the law now was drawn by me on the floor of the House to meet the very proposition of the assignment of these Commerce Court judges in part, and other circuit judges, where there was necessity for these judges to do work in the district court instead of the court of appeals. We abolished the circuit courts by the judicial title act and provided that all of the nisi prius jurisdiction should be in the district court. In some of the circuits at that time there were four circuit judges, and there was probability that there would be additional circuit judges appointed to different circuits by assignment from the Commerce Court. That was before there was talk of abolishing that court.

Now, the proposition is to abolish the Commerce Court but to retain the circuit judges upon the Commerce Court, and I take it that it is the policy of the other side of the House, because it is absolutely essential to make an appropriation to support the Commerce Court after the 1st of July or else abolish the court and transfer the jurisdiction which that court possesses over suits relating to railway transportation, and so forth, back to district courts, and, as I understand, that is the policy. Now, if we have these four additional circuit judges out of the Commerce Court, the Supreme Court of the United States, which is, presumably, or can easily be made, familiar with the necessities of the different circuits and districts, can assign one of these circuit judges to the work at Philadelphia, and he can then be assigned to work in the district courts, which is the only place where he can work. There is no place—I call the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to the fact—there is no place where these Commerce Court judges can be assigned to do simply the work of a court of appeals, unless one of them can be so assigned to the circuit right south of us here, because in all of the other circuits they now have three circuit judges to sit as the court of appeals, which is the entire number that can be used. In the circuit at Chicago they now have four circuit judges, who are available on the circuit court of appeals under the law, although there is a vacancy in one of them which could be filled with an additional Commerce Court judge, who I think would like to be sent there but possibly ought not to be. I agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the circumstances which he has narrated entitle the people of the city of Philadelphia to relief, but I think it is just as feasible and would be done just as quickly to transfer one of the Commerce Court judges to that circuit and give him the work in that district without creating an additional district judge. The truth is that we have too many United States judges now. There are a large number of them in many places who are not very fully occupied, and instead of constantly increasing the number we ought to have those who are appointed doing the work, occupying their time, and, if necessary, restrict the jurisdiction of the Federal court and have more of it done by the State court.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. COX. Can the gentleman inform the committee whether or not any one of the members of the Commerce Court is a citizen of the district in which Philadelphia is situated?

Mr. MANN. Not one of them is. The judge from Pennsylvania who was appointed on the Commerce Court, and the only one from that State, is, unfortunately, for himself at least, not now filling that place.

Mr. COX. I never thought about that.

Mr. MARTIN. Is that the vacancy that exists?

Mr. MANN. It is.

Mr. MARTIN. Of course that vacancy can be filled, if the administration so desires.

Mr. MANN. It could be filled, but, I take it, it probably would not be filled by the President pending the determination of what is to be done concerning the Commerce Court.

Mr. MARTIN. Will the gentleman yield? Did I understand the gentleman correctly, that there is no work upon the circuit court of appeals of the United States to which any of these judges could be assigned except in the district south of us?

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes; they could be assigned any place and do work, but usually the circuit court has now three circuit judges to sit on the circuit court of appeals, and the circuit court of appeals only consisting of three, of course they can call upon the district judge besides, except the one circuit to the south of us.

Mr. MARTIN. Then, if the policy of the administration has foreshadowed by the open opposition that has been put forward in the last year or two in the efforts to abolish this Commerce Court shall continue, to what services could these circuit judges, now members of this Commerce Court, be actually assigned except services just like the one now existing in the eastern district of Pennsylvania?

Mr. MANN. Why, it is the only way, or some of the present circuit judges now on the circuit court of appeals will go to work on the district courts—nothing else for them to do. It is either do that or do nothing, and, I suppose, I would not like to charge that against them.

Mr. LOGUE. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the gentleman from Connecticut, I beg leave to state that, being engaged in the practice of my profession before this court, the work there is not of the character that has been intimated. It is not police-justice work. It involves large questions.

The reference that has been made by my colleague [Mr. MOORE] to the case that brought Judge Witmer to try there recently, was a case involving one of the greatest frauds to be heard by the criminal side of the court that has ever been perpetrated in the United States. It occupied in trial some seven weeks. There are in the city of Philadelphia seven referees in bankruptcy. The bankruptcy business has grown immensely. There are constant appeals from the decisions of referees, the trial of cases occupying not only the weeks, as stated by my colleague [Mr. PALMER], but has been extended, motions for new trials to be heard, arguments on other branches, the equity side to be considered, and an immense number of contested rebate suits brought in this court, involving hundreds of thousands of dollars, and some of them, to my personal knowledge, taking several weeks to try. I consider that a judge in the eastern district, even with the two of them there, who half attends to his duties, who sits in on the motion list, and pays heed to what is presented to him, who listens to the arguments for new trials, and pays attention to the brief, that takes part in the criminal and civil trials, has his time fully occupied.

I had occasion to visit Judge Thompson recently. He showed to me the mass of work that he was unable to reach and give proper attention. He is working from 9 o'clock in the morning until late at night.

This is not a plea simply for a place for some one; it is a plea on behalf of congested business.

Mr. DONOVAN. Will the gentleman permit an interruption right here?

Mr. LOGUE. Certainly.

Mr. DONOVAN. You can save your friend, as the gentleman suggested, a great deal of labor. There is an army of lawyers that will be willing to take his place, and probably will fill it just as well intellectually. There is no dearth of men for these positions, and if you will make a move to cut down these great positions to 75 you will still be able to fill them. In my opinion you do not need to worry in that regard.

Mr. LOGUE. I would rather be active as to the kindly consideration of a man who has sacrificed the best years of his life in public duties at what I consider an inadequate salary—a man who has sat there at times when his duty to himself and his family called for him to be off the bench and in his bed, a man who was given by his disease to such paroxysms of coughing that he would temporarily have to leave the bench and go to his room and lie down on a couch. I would rather pay a tribute to the worth of men and preach the doctrine that the laborer is worthy of his hire, and that men faithful in public service will recognize that the performance of duty means something, and that they are not to be relegated to the poorhouse in time of infirmity. [Applause.] The younger members of the bar are not seeking the position at the expense of injustice to a well-tried public servant. It is public duty and public work that I am pleading for, in the interest of the quick administration of justice, which to my mind brings about always the best results. Litigants grow tired, people become weary, of the lack of prosecution of civil cases. They grow disrespectful by reason of the failure to quickly move on the criminal side of the court. The quick administration of justice, to my mind, does much for public good, and it is not only for the private litigant but for all that I urge that this bill should receive favorable consideration, not in the favor of anyone but in the belief of a public stress and in the interest of the public business. [Applause.]

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to occupy much of the time of the committee, but it seems to me that some gentlemen labor under a misapprehension as to the real purpose of this bill. Its purpose is not to create a new judgeship. It is in effect to provide for the filling of an existing judgeship, because the judge who now has that position is unable, and permanently unable, to discharge the duties of the office.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Connecticut?

Mr. CLAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. DONOVAN. There are other cases more aggravated than this one and no move has been made to fill the positions. The duties have been performed by transfer of judges from other circuits. There have been cases of death where an entire State is left without a judge. Those duties are performed by transfer and the same thing could be done here.

Mr. CLAYTON. Well, the gentleman is in possession of information that I have never received myself. The lamentable condition to which the gentleman from Connecticut calls attention has never been made known to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The gentleman has been giving us some wonderful information, and I can say to the gentleman in all good humor that I hope he will bring the cases which he has in his knowledge, and which he has just mentioned, to the attention of the House; and if he will introduce bills to provide for these cases that he mentions—and they ought to be provided for, if they exist anywhere except in his imagination—we will undertake to have the Committee on Rules bring in a rule similar to this in order to do the right thing in those cases. Or if the Committee on the Judiciary is formed soon, I have no doubt that committee will report bills and that the House will legislate in those cases.

Mr. Chairman, I do not know of any such cases as my honorable friend from Connecticut has referred to; but, of course, no man—I do not care how long he has served in this House—can undertake to have a perfect knowledge of the whole country, although he may have been studying this question of the proper administration of public justice for 16 years or longer. But we are always glad to have enlightenment.

Now, Mr. Chairman, when diverted I was directing the attention of the House to what this case is. This bill is not for the purpose of creating a new judgeship as we ordinarily understand that term. It is to provide for the filling of an office now held by one who seems to be a dying man. We do not know how soon the breath will leave his body. The public business in the meantime is piling up. The public necessity is becoming more urgent every day for a live man to discharge the duties of this high and important office. The man who happens to fill it now, and who will fill it as long as the breath is in his body, is unable to discharge the duties of his office, and hence this case is urgent. It is a sad case, it is true, because it has connected with it the deplorable condition of this judge; so that, I say, the case in effect is simply to provide for the appointment of his successor now.

And it is not without precedent. I can recall several such cases, as I undertook to do awhile ago. It will be remembered by the older Members of this House, including the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]—for I think he and I came into Congress about the same time—that in the case of Judge Ricks, I believe his name was, a judge out there in Ohio, who was suffering from an incurable malady, a judge was appointed under a bill similar to this, because it was made manifest to the Committee on the Judiciary and it was made apparent to the House that the judge was suffering from an incurable malady and that in the meantime the public was suffering from an inadequate administration of justice.

And in the case of Judge Rector, of Texas, who was suffering from mental decay—softening of the brain I believe it was—he could not have resigned if he had wanted to because his condition was such that he could not perform that act; and Judge Lanham, of Texas, a Member of this House and a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, afterwards governor of Texas, reported the bill from the Committee on the Judiciary to provide for a successor of Judge Rector, just as in this case.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. MARTIN. About how long has this present incumbent been in this critical condition?

Mr. CLAYTON. Well, for something like a year or more. But his condition has been growing worse, and it became very much worse last winter; his case became perfectly hopeless and he became practically helpless last winter. So that is the case that we have before the House now, Mr. Chairman.

I want to remind the House, too, that we hear much in these days about the delays of the courts. We are all familiar with the old maxim that justice ought to be without bargain, sale, or denial; to which we might add that it ought to be without undue delay, because long delay is frequently the denial of justice. That is the case here. The long delay in business there amounts in many cases to a denial of public justice. Judge Gray appeared before the Committee on the Judiciary in February last. And right here permit me to say that that committee at their session were of the unanimous opinion, no party lines being drawn, that this bill ought to pass at that time, but the condition of the work before the House was such that it was known that it could not pass at that session, and the assurance was given that the committee would act favorably upon it at this session.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CLAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Was it not just as easy to bring in a rule at the last session as it is at this session? It seems to be very easy at this session.

Mr. CLAYTON. We were informed that it was not.

Mr. MANN. We had several——

Mr. CLAYTON. We were told that there was pressure of other matters, and, as the distinguished gentleman from Illinois knows, the committee had quite a number of things upon the calendar, and had business elsewhere, if he will remember, and it was impossible to get this matter before the House and to get it passed.

Mr. MANN. I remember that there was plenty of opportunity——

Mr. HARDWICK. I wish to suggest to my friend from Illinois that at the end of the last session we were so congested with necessary appropriation bills that if we had opened the floodgates to anything else, even the appropriation bills might have failed.

Mr. MANN. They did open the floodgates. They did report special rules.

Mr. HARDWICK. No, sir; they did not.

Mr. MANN. For chicken feed.

Mr. CLAYTON. I was informed of that condition, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER], who was the author of the bill, appeared before the committee, and he and the committee tried to devise some plan by which, in the judgment of the committee and himself, we could possibly have this legislation enacted at the last session, and we reached the conclusion that it could not be done at that time.

Now, Mr. Chairman, Judge Gray, who is the senior circuit judge in that circuit over there, appeared before the committee, with a number of distinguished lawyers from Philadelphia, and all testified. I want to quote a little from Judge Gray. He was asked whether the condition of the court at Philadelphia could be relieved or cared for by the designation of other judges. He said:

"Well, as to that question, I am glad to have an opportunity to say a word. I had not expected to speak at all. Prior to January, 1912—I say that because I do not know the exact month—in the latter part of 1911 Judge Holland's physical condition was so apparent to all of us who came in contact with him from time to time that we consulted together, the circuit judges, and finally he was told that he ought to take a vacation. His physician had advised him that he could not continue with his work, and we agreed that he should take a vacation for six months, I think it was, and we told him we would relieve him, and that he should go away and not worry about his business."

Mr. FARR. What was the date of that?

Mr. CLAYTON. Judge Gray was making this statement on the 14th day of February last. He continued:

"It fell to my lot as senior circuit judge to render assistance during his absence. That assistance was rendered, but at a good deal of inconvenience to the district judges who were called upon. Judge Witmer, from the middle district, was called upon, also the judges from New Jersey and Delaware when we could get them—all took their turns in the transaction of this business. Judge Holland came back in October or November, 1912, and made what has been called here, without exaggeration, a heroic attempt to do the work he had left. I saw him during these intervals, and, as Mr. Glasgow has said, you had but to look at him to realize that his life's work is done. It is a very delicate thing to pronounce the doom of a man for whom you have a high regard, and, like a member of your own family, you hope against hope. I hope he can come back, but I feel, as I have said, that he will never do any more judicial work, and the congestion now in the district is enhanced by the fact that one of the judges—there are two district judges in the district of New Jersey, and one of these has been a very hard-working judge—has been advised by his physician that he must not attempt to try any jury cases, that it is not advisable from a medical standpoint. So we are not only cut off from relief in that direction, but business in that district is also congested. I understand that Judge Witmer has gone to Florida for a few weeks, which makes it very hard for us to get help. We are trying to get as much assistance as we can from the circuit, but we have been compelled lately to go outside. We are now trying to get a judge assigned from Ohio, where we have found one who is willing to come. We are also trying to get one from Tennessee. I saw the Chief Justice yesterday and he said he would make the appointment. There is one matter I should like to speak of which is a very important factor, and that is the increasing business of the circuit court. The circuit court of appeals has all it can do. The State of New Jersey has one circuit court, and we all know that the most important corporations we have in the country and that come under the criticism in the Sherman antitrust law have been corporations in the State of New Jersey, and necessarily the litigation that has ensued and is liable to ensue will come within our circuit court, and that is a very large factor to be considered in estimating the amount of business that will come before the appellate court. Now, I have only to say that my personal opinion is such as the members of the bar have given, that Judge Holland will never sit on the bench again."

The chairman asked him:

"Do you think, Judge, that any assignment of district judges is possible to take care of or relieve this situation in Philadelphia?"

To which Judge Gray responded:

"It has ceased to be a temporary emergency, and it will have to be provided for permanently. Now, I have only to say that my personal opinion is such as the Members have given, that Judge Holland will never sit on the bench again."

The chairman asked him:

"You do not think, then, Judge, that any assignment of district judges is possible to take care of or relieve this situation in Philadelphia?"

Judge Gray answered:

"It has ceased to be a temporary emergency, and will have to be provided for permanently."

This assignment of judges, as Members of the House who are familiar with the subject know, is simply to reach emergency cases. Here is not a case of emergency, but one that exists now and will continue to exist and can not be relieved until a judge is appointed permanently to do the work there.

The chairman again asked Judge Gray:

"You can have some measure of relief in that way, but not adequate relief until you have a good judge, strong and vigorous and able to do the full work of a judge?"

Judge Gray answered:

"I have no doubt about that, sir."

Then, again, the chairman said:

"The committee will want to be persuaded that Judge Holland has an incurable malady and that the situation is such that there ought to be another judge at this time, that you can not take care of it by the temporary assignment of other district judges."

To which Judge Gray said:

"That is a fact, Mr. Chairman."

The chairman again said:

"I understand you to say that his condition is incurable, in your opinion, and that the temporary assignment of other district judges can not take care of the situation there adequately."

Judge Gray replied:

"I have not heard in the last two or three months any other opinion than that he doubtless will never be on the bench again to do the work of a judge."

Mr. MARTIN. When was this statement taken?

Mr. CLAYTON. On the 14th of February last.

Mr. MARTIN. Before whom?

Mr. CLAYTON. Before the Committee on the Judiciary, in the House Office Building, overlooking the Congressional Library. [Laughter.]

Mr. MARTIN. I wanted to know if it was before a duly authorized body.

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes; taken by the Judiciary Committee at a regular meeting.

Mr. MARTIN. Why did not the committee act at that time?

Mr. CLAYTON. I undertook to explain that a little while ago, and I will do it again if the gentleman desires.

Mr. MARTIN. I heard the gentleman's explanation before.

Mr. CLAYTON. Then my explanation did not explain to the gentleman's satisfaction, which I regret.

The chairman again asked Judge Gray:

"All these matters falling under your jurisdiction and under your observation, I am quite sure the committee will value your opinion very highly. You concur in the view expressed by members of the bar that it is absolutely necessary for the correct administration of justice that this bill be passed providing for the appointment of another judge?"

And Judge Gray replied:

"That is my opinion, Mr. Chairman."

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLAYTON. With great pleasure.

Mr. HARDY. The fact is, I hardly know how I feel like voting on the question, but I want to ask the gentleman as to the suggestion made by the gentleman from Illinois a moment ago, whether or not one of these Commerce Court judges could not be assigned permanently to this place; and if so, what objection is there to it?

Mr. CLAYTON. He certainly could not be assigned right now. I do not think it would be advisable, because the Commerce Court is in existence. What will become of it after the 1st of July I do not know, but it is still in existence now, and it is now doing business. But the situation in this case demands a judge resident in the city of Philadelphia. In that great commercial metropolis, in that great business center, there is so much commerce and so much litigation that it is necessary to have not only one judge but two judges there. Everybody knows that much of the business of a judge is in granting interlocutory orders in hearing matters outside of the mere ordinary court trials where there is a jury. He frequently tries matters at chambers, and for the correct administration of justice it is necessary to have these two judges. If I had time I would like to read to the House the testimony given by the lawyers, not only as to the condition of this judge, but as to the condition of the public business. All the testimony shows conclusively, in my opinion, that there ought to be another good, strong, live, vigorous judge there all the time. Judge Thompson, the other distinguished judge, sits on the bench, I think, according to this testimony, longer than any other judge in the United States, and yet the business is piling up on him.

He works day in and day out, practically, trying to dispose of the business in the court, in the ordinary courthouse trial and sitting to hear matters in chambers. He can not do it, however. He is doing his best, and some of the members of the bar informed the committee that if Judge Thompson were compelled to keep up his work his health would eventually fail. I think, Mr. Chairman, that this bill calls for immediate legislation. I think it is of such emergency nature and so meritorious that it ought to pass at once, and I hope that it will receive the approval of the House.

Mr. FARR. Mr. Chairman, there is no special need at this time, in this unusual way, to pass this bill providing for the appointment of an additional judge in the eastern district. Judges from other districts can be assigned for some months hence to do what necessary work is to be done, just as in the past. It surprises me that not one of the members from the great city of Philadelphia has not discovered the situation in that city, if it be so serious as alleged, and acted in this matter. Judge Holland does not want to be retired. He has not intimated to any friend of his in the House from Pennsylvania that he wants to be relieved.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FARR. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE. I did not quite get the drift of the gentleman's remarks about the Members from Philadelphia not being alive to their duty.

Mr. FARR. I said if the necessities were so great, that certainly some gentleman—live factors as are the Representatives from the city of Philadelphia—would be aware of that condition and would do his duty here.

Mr. MOORE. Did the gentleman listen to my statement a few moments ago?

Mr. FARR. I did.

Mr. MOORE. Did I not say that there was a congestion of business in this court?

Mr. FARR. Oh, there is more or less of a congestion of business in every court.

Mr. MOORE. And that last week this judge was at his office?

Mr. FARR. I was coming to that. Judge Holland is not so ill, according to the testimony of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] but that he was able to go to his office last week. I want to assure this House now that I do not believe Judge Holland is in sympathy with this movement. His name has been used here frequently, and much sympathy has been expressed for him and the inference allowed to prevail that they were acting in concert with his wishes, which is not true.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FARR. Yes.

Mr. DYER. I would like to ask the gentleman if he does not think it would be embarrassing to Judge Holland to indicate his wish to have this action taken under the circumstances?

Mr. FARR. No.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FARR. Yes. I will yield, although the gentleman refused to yield to me.

Mr. PALMER. Has Judge Holland communicated to my colleague his opposition to this proposition?

Mr. FARR. No; he has not.

Mr. PALMER. What is the gentleman's authority for saying that?

Mr. FARR. Because I am convinced he is not. I know that none of our Members has taken any interest in the matter—that is, none of the Members from that judicial district. The gentleman belongs in another district.

Mr. PALMER. I beg the gentleman's pardon. His ignorance upon that is like his lack of knowledge on the other proposition. A part of my congressional district is in that judicial district.

Mr. FARR. I should have said where the gentleman lives is not in that district. There is no special reason at this time, Mr. Chairman, for passing on this bill. This is not the proper way in which to do so. A count shows that nearly three-fourths of the Members of this House are not here.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FARR. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. Is the gentleman's district in the eastern judicial district of Pennsylvania?

Mr. FARR. In the middle.

Mr. MOORE. Is it not true that the judge who sits in the middle district came to the eastern district to relieve Judge Holland in the Lumber Conspiracy trial a few weeks ago?

Mr. FARR. Oh, judges come from different districts into other districts to relieve, quite frequently. That is a common matter.

Mr. MOORE. Is there not a question now as to the appointment of a judge in the middle district?

Mr. FARR. Not that I know. The chances are that you will have three judges in the eastern or Philadelphia district. No one on this floor has a right to say that Judge Holland is afflicted with an incurable disease. There is no testimony here from any physician, and, as I before said, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] last night expressed his surprise at the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr.

PALMER] that Judge Holland was in the serious condition stated by Mr. PALMER. And yet the gentleman from Philadelphia [Mr. BUTLER] is an intimate friend of Judge Holland.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FARR. There is sufficient doubt, at least, Mr. Chairman, in my mind, to prevent me from voting intelligently upon it, and in view of the fact that so many Members are absent from this House it is an inopportune time to create this new judge. There has been ample time during the months past in which they say this court has been congested to have acted, and yet not one gentleman representing this great city of Philadelphia has moved in this direction.

Mr. DONOVAN. Now, Mr. Chairman, perhaps we can find this fly in the ointment. I understand the gentleman to say that none of the Congressmen of that district which this district court judge covers has taken any interest in it. Is that true?

Mr. FARR. Not one that I have discovered.

Mr. DONOVAN. Now, we have got the Ethopian in the wood pile. Politics is the reason, I understand. It has been turned into a political question of $7,000 a year for life. Oh, it is a delightful prize.

Mr. FARR. I will say in fairness to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER], that I really did not know that any part of his congressional district was in the eastern, or Philadelphia, judicial district; but he lives so far away from this point and is so little in touch with it that it seems to me a little bit out of the ordinary for him to have introduced this bill; but I make no imputation whatever upon the motives of the gentleman. I think this bill comes in at an inopportune time, and that Congress ought not to create an additional judgeship in this unusual way. I think that Judge Holland ought to have a chance to use the six months vacational period that was given him, and the fact that he was at his office within the last week, as stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], and that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER], who is intimately acquainted with him, has no knowledge that his illness is as serious as is stated, and the additional fact that he is only a little over 50 years of age, all would indicate to me that we are going to have three judges in that district instead of two who are now there.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Chairman, this eastern district of Pennsylvania covers the entire city of Philadelphia and a number of adjoining counties. It includes all of the congressional districts of all the gentlemen who represent the city of Philadelphia, includes the district represented by Mr. BUTLER, the district represented by Mr. DIFENDERFER, part of the district represented by Mr. ROTHERMEL, and a part of the district represented by myself, and it seems to me that as a part of my district is comprised within the judicial district there can be no impropriety in my having introduced this bill. In addition to that, Mr. Chairman, every Member of this House whose district, or parts of whose district are included within that judicial district, with one exception, has told me that he is in favor of this bill, and the one exception happens to be a Member from the city of Philadelphia, whom I have not been able to see upon the matter and who is not here to-day, but I am advised by others that he also approves of this measure. The reason I introduced the bill was simply that a personal friend, who was a member of the committee on judicial vacancies in Philadelphia, called it to my attention and asked me to introduce the measure. Now, I confess that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FARR] has shown his courage even if by the showing of it he has also exhibited his bad judgment on this proposition, for he has had the temerity, while acknowledging that he has no information on the subject whatever, to place his judgment against the leaders of the Philadelphia bar, from John G. Johnson down, and the judges of the courts like Judge George Gray and Judge McPherson and the personal friends and intimate associates of Judge Holland, who declare that his condition is as I have stated it upon this floor; yet the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FARR] says he is well enough to go back upon the bench, because he is only a little over 50 years old, and that is a presumption that he will go back——

Mr. FARR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMER. There is no presumption arising in favor of a man at that time of life who for years has suffered the ravages of the disease with which Judge Holland is afflicted, and the gentleman knows it.

Mr. FARR. I simply stated that there was no report from a physician.

Mr. PALMER. No; that was not the statement. If the gentleman had simply stated that, it would have been quite a different matter. There was not any necessity for a report of a physician when Judge Gray and Judge McPherson say that any man by looking at Judge Holland would know what his condition is.

Mr. FARR. I hope he may come back.

Mr. PALMER. I hope he may come back; but the gentleman ought not to put his opinion on a matter against the unanimous opinion of everybody who knows anything about it.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield a few moments to me?

Mr. PALMER. I am anxious to conclude debate.

Mr. MOORE. So am I.

Mr. PALMER. I thought I would now move to go into the House and limit debate. When the House again resolves itself in the Committee of the Whole the gentleman can be recognized under the five-minute rule.

Mr. MOORE. I want to say that I am a little surprised at the statement of my colleague [Mr. FARR], who apparently does not know anything about this situation and who does somewhat impugn the information of the gentlemen who represent the Philadelphia district. Judge Holland does not live in Philadelphia. He is a resident of Montgomery County. I do not know whether Judge Whitaker Thompson votes in Philadelphia. This is not primarily a Philadelphia proposition; it as an eastern-district proposition.

But what I did want to say is that I personally know Judge Holland. I have been in frequent consultation with Judge Holland in days gone by; have dined with him occasionally; have seen him riding out for the benefit of his health; have watched him as he came and went; and have seen him within the last three months. I had a conversation with him not long ago, when he intimated that there was a question about his health and his ability to continue to serve. He then said, "I will fool them yet." It was the hope of a man hoping against this malady which has been referred to; it was the hope of a man who believed he would get better; but the fact remains he has not gotten better and that he has not been able recently to serve on the bench.

As a Representative of a Philadelphia district and as a friend of the judge, I would have hesitated to introduce the question of his malady at all, and, as a matter of kindness to a friend, though I may have been lacking in my duty as a Representative of Philadelphia, as intimated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FARR], I still would have hesitated about bringing this question before the House and prolonging it as it has been prolonged.

I have listened for the last hour or two to questions affecting the health of the judge. It has been so delicate a matter that I have felt that as an act of kindness to a friend, as well as in justice and fairness to ourselves as Members of a legislative body, we should act upon this measure quickly and without unnecessarily emphasizing the personal details.

Mr. FARR. Will the gentleman permit me to say one thing?

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman will not make that motion.

Mr. MARTIN. Will the gentleman allow me a question before he puts that motion?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] will notice that he used most of the time on that side of the House in favor of the bill.

Mr. PALMER. If there is anybody over there who desires time——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN] has endeavored to get recognition, and was entitled to recognition when the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] was recognized.

Mr. PALMER. I will not insist upon it if the gentleman from South Dakota desires to address the committee. He will have an opportunity under the five-minute rule, of course.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Chairman, I was seeking recognition, and did not want to be discourteous to the gentleman.

To me it is a little humorous, if we can admit humor into a situation that is surrounded with the solemnity that is sought to be thrown about this bill, to witness the spectacle of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON], chairman of the great Committee on the Judiciary in the last Congress and undoubtedly to be chairman of that same committee in this, reading pages of important testimony taken before that committee last February and stating to the House that in his judgment it is absolutely necessary that immediate action should be had in an emergency measure, and without any sufficient explanation of why the emergency was not acted upon when the testimony was brought to the attention of his committee.

Mr. CLAYTON. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. MARTIN. Certainly.

Mr. CLAYTON. I undertook to tell why that was so. I was unfortunate in not having the attention of the gentleman.

Mr. MARTIN. The gentleman had my attention.

Mr. CLAYTON. Therefore, for his understanding, I will ask him to read to-morrow morning that portion of my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. MARTIN. I heard every word the gentleman said, and listened to it intently. His explanation was that the last Congress was one in which appropriation bills were entitled to precedence.

Mr. CLAYTON. I will say to the gentleman he may put his own construction on what I said, but I dissent very radically from the opinion he expressed of what I did say.

Mr. MARTIN. Well, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] may possibly dissent from it when he has heard my opinion, but the explanation that the gentleman made was in substance what I am going to say when I state it.

Mr. CLAYTON. I do not agree that it is in substance what you are going to say. I will say that in advance.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] having expressed his opinion about something which he has not yet heard and can not know about, does the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN] think that the gentleman from Alabama proceeded on the same theory in the discussion of this case? [Laughter.]

Mr. CLAYTON. I may say that I am so familiar with the mental processes of the gentleman from South Dakota that I know in advance that I can not agree with him. [Laughter.]

Mr. MARTIN. Well, some gentlemen are very wise when they do not know the facts.

Mr. CLAYTON. And some are not wise even after some gentleman has told them the facts.

Mr. MARTIN. I think it was the great Socrates who said that he considered himself the wisest of men because, although he lived in an ignorant age, he knew his ignorance, while his fellow creatures did not know theirs. Others were ignorant, but thought themselves wise.

Mr. CLAYTON. There we have a modern Socrates. [Laughter.]

Mr. MARTIN. I will not yield further, Mr. Chairman, to interruptions of that kind.

Now, perhaps the Members of the House have no doubt about the facts, but they will be able to compare what the gentleman from Alabama has said and what I am about to say in the RECORD in the morning, and they can reach their own conclusions therefrom. My understanding is that the explanation of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] as to why action was not taken in this case, upon testimony introduced before his committee when he was chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, and the committee was then in shape to act, while we have no committee now——

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Dakota yield to the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. MARTIN. Let me finish at least a sentence. The gentleman's explanation was, in substance, that at that time the House was necessarily giving precedence to the appropriation measures, and it was quite a difficult proposition to get through all the appropriation bills at the last session of Congress.

Now I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CARLIN. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that this hearing was not had before the Committee on the Judiciary until the 14th day of February, and had that committee acted, or tried to act, it would have found that there was no other call that the committee had, under the call of committees, between that time and the 4th day of March, which was the day of adjournment. There was no Calendar Wednesday after the 14th of February to which we were entitled, and therefore it was a matter resting entirely with the Rules Committee.

Mr. MARTIN. Yes. But you have no Committee on the Judiciary at all now, and you had a Rules Committee then as now. You could have acted at the last session with a better compliance with the rules than you are acting now.

Mr. CARLIN. There was no opportunity offered.

Mr. MANN. There was a Committee on Rules at that time.

Mr. MARTIN. Exactly. And there was also a Committee on the Judiciary, which had already heard testimony on the case, which the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] says is overwhelming and convincing—so much so that action ought now to be taken. The Committee on the Judiciary at the last Congress and, if I am not entirely mistaken, after this date of the 14th of February——

Mr. CARLIN. I did not hear the gentleman. I did not catch his remarks.

Mr. MARTIN. I was saying that the Committee on the Judiciary at the last session of Congress and, if I am not entirely mistaken, after the 14th day of February, brought important business from that committee before this House, which was acted upon and which became law, among other things, the celebrated Webb bill.

Mr. CARLIN. Yes; that came up before the 14th of February, according to my impression, but the Rules Committee gave that consideration.

Mr. MARTIN. My impression is that the committee brought in the Webb bill after the 14th of February. The gentleman knows very well, conceding the correctness of all that he states, that we could have had a rule brought in then with greater propriety than it is brought in now.

Mr. CARLIN. But, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MARTIN. I will not yield to debate with the gentleman, although I will submit to a question. I remember a very important piece of legislation that was brought from that committee—the Committee on the Judiciary—in the closing days of Congress, and I think was acted on during one of the first days of March—a bill that would prevent the Federal courts from interfering with State courts in the enforcement of State statutes until the constitutionality of such laws should be passed upon first by the supreme court of the State. That committee also brought other matters before this body, and often they were without any special intervention by means of a rule; and they could have passed this bill, in my judgment, at that time without any intervention of the Committee on Rules whatever. Certainly it could have been passed by a rule, and we had the Rules Committee in operation then as now.

This is an emergency proposition, however you clothe it, and it is an emergency situation, and nothing else. The emergency has existed for at least a year and a half. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON], in answer to a question from me as to how long this judge had been critically ill, said he had been ill for something over a year, and that he became more seriously ill, if not entirely disabled, last winter.

All of that time has intervened, and his committee had the full case before them with jurisdiction to act, and still they delayed action. Now, there may be some other explanation, and the explanation already given by the gentleman may be entirely satisfactory to the other Members of the House. It does not convince me that action upon this important bill, which was then pending, having been previously introduced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] was delayed because of the inability of the Committee on the Judiciary to get a hearing in this House upon that important proposition at that time.

I think that our brethren upon the other side of the Chamber ought to be consistent upon this question of the Federal courts and the Federal judiciary. They have made several efforts to repeal the Commerce Court act. They have practically repealed it in effect, by refusing to appropriate for it for the coming fiscal year. What will be the status on the 1st day of July? There are four of these regularly commissioned circuit judges of the United States who will be without any compensation to serve upon the Commerce Court. Everybody knows that their salaries will have to be paid. Everybody knows that we can not by failure to appropriate for their salaries deprive them of their life positions, or of compensation for the same. There is no reason in the world why one of these judges after the 1st day of July can not be assigned to service in the eastern circuit of Pennsylvania.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN. Certainly.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman does not know, does he, that this Commerce Court will be finally abolished? Does he not know that there is a strong effort now being made by a great many people and business concerns to have this court retained?

Mr. MARTIN. Unfortunately, perhaps, for the country, the people and the business concerns of the country do not have in their charge the creation or the dismemberment of the courts. That is done by the Congress, and the Congress as at present constituted and as it has been constituted for the past two years is against this Commerce Court. It has refused to appropriate for it, and in my judgment, undoubtedly will abolish the court.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman does not know that this Congress will do that, does he? I will ask him if the Committee on Appropriations report an appropriation to take care of this court, will not the life of it be continued?

Mr. MARTIN. If they should; but I do not suppose the gentleman has any intimation—I certainly have none—or any expectation that the Appropriations Committee will report any such appropriation, after the whole course of the committee to the contrary.

This is an emergency situation. You have waited for a year and a half, up to date, without meeting it. You have had the testimony before you showing the great stress and necessity of it for some months. You have not acted when you could have acted. Now, if you will just wait less than 60 days more you will have four judges in all probability, either one of whom you can assign to that circuit and so relieve this situation.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. And the committees will be appointed on the 1st of June.

Mr. MARTIN. As my colleague suggests, on the 1st of June the committees will be appointed and you will then have a Committee on the Judiciary to act upon this question in regular form. It seems to me that no change has arisen in this emergency between the 14th day of February and this, the 10th day of May, to make this remarkable and unusual procedure justifiable at this time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that general debate on the bill be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that general debate on this bill be now closed. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States shall appoint an additional district judge for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, who shall reside in said district and shall possess the same qualifications and have the same power and jurisdiction and receive the same salary now prescribed by law in respect of the present district judges therein.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add, at the end of line 9, the following:

"Provided, however, That the President shall make public all indorsements made in behalf of any applicant for appointment as such district judge."

[Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I shall not vote for my own amendment; but we have had two roll calls in the House in the last Congress, on which practically all of the Democratic Members voted for an amendment somewhat similar to this, providing, however, in reference to all judges, both district, circuit, and supreme.

I did not offer the amendment in that shape. Possibly I should have done so and permitted the gentleman from Pennsylvania to make a point of order against it, but I have preferred to offer an amendment which is germane. So I have offered this amendment, which has been twice voted for on roll calls by the Democratic side of the House. I have offered it to see whether they have the same opinion now that they held before, when there was a Republican President.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this amendment, but the gentleman from Illinois has relieved me from the necessity of making any argument against it. He says himself that he is opposed to it, that he does not believe in it, and so we all ought to be agreed on the proposition. I would have no objection myself to such a provision in the law in relation to all appointments of judges or any other officers, but I do not believe it is good practice to start in upon such a course with respect to a single nomination.

Mr. MANN. I would like to ask the gentleman if he voted for the Cullop amendment?

Mr. PALMER. I think I voted for the Cullop amendment, but I would not be certain.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, can we have the amendment again reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I voted against the Cullop amendment, and I have a very distinct recollection of it, because at a subsequent time I was reminded of it very frequently in a campaign for nomination for Congress in my district. I intend to vote against this amendment. I do not think it is a matter that ought to be treated lightly. I think it is fair to us who voted against it before, and fair to me, to give the reasons that will impel me to vote against it, and what impelled me to vote against it before.

The fact is, it is beyond the constitutional power of Congress to provide any such limitation upon the Executive. If the President of the United States should to-morrow issue a proclamation requiring that all Members of Congress before they voted upon any matter of legislation should make public the indorsement or the communications that they had received in regard to that legislation, such a proclamation would be laughed to scorn, and it would be said that the President had exceeded his constitutional power in an effort to interfere with the action of the Representatives in Congress in voting on matters of legislation.

The same Constitution which gives the Congress of the United States the legislative power imposes upon the President the duty, with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint judges and other officers therein named. He may make the appointment on indorsement, he may make the appointment without indorsement, he may make it despite indorsement. There can be no obligation laid upon him by the legislative branch that can interfere with his constitutional performance of that function of appointment.

It was upon this proposition, not that I objected to any publicity about it, but upon this fundamental proposition that I voted against the Cullop proposition, and for that reason I shall vote against this.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I recollect very well when we were considering the creation of a new district court in Chicago some time ago, the necessity for which was undoubted, that nearly every Democrat in the House voted for the Cullop amendment which, in effect, is the same amendment as now offered by my colleague this afternoon. I was very much interested in the creation of that new district court, because of the need of such a court. I was enthusiastically in favor of the legislation until after the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] introduced his amendment. When the question of the creation of a court under the conditions provided came up for a vote, I voted against the bill. I would vote against this amendment, but I hope that if the bill now before the House is finally enacted into law that the Members of the House will have an opportunity to put themselves on record, either for or against this amendment, and I say that with the hope that those Democrats who then voted for the other amendment may have an opportunity to let the public know whether they are still of the same opinion.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I want to put myself on record in this matter. I am not absolutely sure of just how the Cullop amendment was framed or worded, or what phase of that amendment I voted on, and it may be that my vote to-day will not be thoroughly consistent with my vote then, but that does not concern me. I wish to express my attitude now, in conformity with what I believe to be right. If the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois is changed a little, I will vote for it. I am perfectly willing to go on record now as voting for a proposition that when the President of the United States appoints a Federal judge he should and ought to be willing to let the country know upon whose indorsement he appoints the judge. But when it comes to the question of making public the indorsements of every other applicant for that office, which are frequently coupled with criticisms of this man and that man, I do not believe the indorsements of persons not appointed ought to be made public. The people have no concern with the indorsements of persons who are not appointed to office. If the amendment is so altered as to require the President to make public only all the indorsements of the man he appoints to serve the people, I would vote for it.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman remember what the provisions in the Cullop amendment were?

Mr. HARDY. I have already said that I do not remember the provisions in the Cullop amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me to read it to him?

Mr. HARDY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. "He shall make public all indorsements made in behalf of any applicant." The gentleman voted for that, I believe.

Mr. HARDY. I do not know whether I did or not.

Mr. MANN. I will inform the gentleman, then, that he did twice; at least once on a roll call.

Mr. HARDY. I take it for granted the gentleman is right, and I am making this statement to show now just what my full deliberation upon the subject has led me to conclude, and that is, that the President ought to be willing and ought to make public the indorsements of the candidate whom he appoints, but I do not believe he ought to make public the indorsements of others.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman voted for it at the time.

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman has heard me state that I accept his statement as to my vote, and he has probably heard me state also that my present expression of opinion may not be entirely consistent with that vote. I care more to do now what I think is right than to be consistent.

Mr. MANN. I have sent to find out whether the gentleman voted for it about six months after the first time. There were two roll calls in the House, some time apart.

Mr. HARDY. I will be glad if the gentleman will state the proposition and just how I voted upon it, but I am not much concerned with that. I want to state my judgment now, and expect to vote now in accordance with that judgment. I shall offer an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, to make it conform to the ideas I am now presenting.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad that we have convinced the Republicans at this late day of the merit of the proposition now pending before the House.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLOP. I can not now. This is no new doctrine for that side of the House. In 1867 the Republican Party passed the civil tenure-of-office act, which not only required the President to make public all of the indorsements upon which he appointed a candidate, but to furnish the public the proof upon which he removed any person holding an office, and his reasons for so doing. It is no new doctrine. If it was constitutional then to require the President to furnish indorsements upon which a candidate was appointed, it is constitutional now. There is not a single constitutional objection that can be successfully urged against this amendment. No President, so far as I can find, has ever hesitated when called upon to make such indorsements public and take the people into his confidence. All have courted publicity rather than secrecy in the discharge of public duty, and more especially so in the appointment of public officials Why should not the President make public, as much as any other person, the indorsement upon which he appoints a man to office? What secrecy is there about it? Why should there be any secrecy about the controlling power or motive behind the appointment of any candidate to fill a public office? The official making the appointment ought to be proud as well as the candidate of the indorsements upon which the appointment is made. The public has a right to know who are responsible for the selection of a public officer; it is interested and should be fully advised. It is a matter of public concern; it is a matter of public importance; and it is proper and just; and our Republican friends should not complain of the doctrine, because they first instituted it in this country in 1867, when they passed the civil tenure-of-office act to control the appointments of and to prevent the removal from office by Andrew Johnson as President of the United States.

Mr. BARTLETT. That was repealed long ago, was it not?

Mr. CULLOP. That has been repealed, but all the time that it was on the statute books nobody tested the constitutionality of the act. Go through all of the decisions in which the question of the validity of that act was involved in the courts, and the constitutionality of the act was never raised or presented for decision. This amendment involves a very wholesome principle, and one which, if enacted, will serve a most useful purpose. I do not think that the present President of the United States would hesitate for a single moment—and I do not see why he should hesitate or why any other appointing power should hesitate—to make public the indorsements of every candidate for office applying for an appointment.

It will do much to protect the courts from unjust criticism which might cast a cloud on the title of some Federal judges and weaken their influence as well as reflect upon the integrity of the appointing power, either or both of which would injure the standing of the court and the influence it should exert in the community. I believe in preserving the integrity of our courts, in protecting them from criticism as far as possible, and in upholding their influence. I believe the adoption of this amendment will be of great benefit in bringing about this result. We all know that too often unjust and severe criticism—criticism for which there is no real cause—is made on the courts of this country because of the secrecy surrounding their selection. Publicity will cure this evil and remove the source for this criticism. It will allay the complaints too often founded on suspicion arising from imaginary causes. Everything should be done to preserve the integrity of our courts. Once let them fall into disrepute and a serious blow, an irreparable injury, has been done our institutions. In their purity and integrity rests the future of the Republic.

A similar amendment to this was adopted by this House in the last Congress and was indorsed by a plank in the Baltimore platform. The Democrats of the Union indorsed it at the last election, and we should adopt it here and now. Some have objected to this amendment because they assert that it encroaches on the constitutional power of the President. In this they are mistaken. They confuse the power of appointment with the power of removal. The Constitution vests the power of removal from office in the President, but it does not invest him with sole power of appointment. He can only appoint with the advice and consent of the Senate. He can remove from office without the cooperation of the Senate or any other body. That power is lodged in him alone. This amendment only provides the manner of procedure in appointing persons to office, and hence it does not divest him of any constitutional rights. It has never been contended in any of the cases where this question arose for determination that it did, but, on the contrary, it has always been asserted the right of providing the procedure was vested in Congress to declare by legislative enactment. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that I can vote for this bill. I feel that there has not been sufficient reasons stated here to indicate that the public service would suffer greatly by waiting until the beginning of the next term of Congress to pass this bill. It seems to me that there is too much haste about this matter at this particular time, for what reason I do not know, but I do know that the summer season is coming on, when the courts are not usually in session. They take the summer vacation, and by the time that the busy season for the courts will come again Congress will be in session and we will then have a Committee on the Judiciary to consider this matter, and it can then come up in the regular way. Again, for the next few months undoubtedly some other regular judge can be assigned to assist in that work. For these reasons I think I shall vote against the bill.

As to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois, I want to make a few suggestions. I do not recall how I voted upon the so-called Cullop amendment——

Mr. FARR. The gentleman voted right.

Mr. HAMLIN. But I shall vote for this amendment. [Applause.] And I shall do it for this reason: There is no use in our trying to conceal the fact that in the appointment of Federal judges throughout the country the opinion has gotten full possession of the people, or the people are in full possession of the opinion, that many of those men have been appointed upon very questionable indorsements; that certain large, influential, special interests in this country have dictated the appointments of the Federal judiciary. Whether that be true or false it is not necessary for me to express an opinion at this time. This bill provides for the appointment of a Federal judge. If this bill becomes a law, I have that confidence in our President to believe that he will not appoint a man upon any such questionable indorsement. I do not believe that he will hesitate to let the country know who indorsed the man that he appoints. If he exercises his perfect right to appoint upon his own initiation, he will not object to letting the people know it, and the people will indorse his act, for they have confidence in him. I believe, especially in view of the opinion that prevails in the country that the Federal judiciary has not always been fair and that that fact is due largely to the influence that brought about their appointment to the bench, that this amendment ought to be adopted. For if the time should ever come when the people shall lose confidence in the courts, then the main bulwark of our Government will be broken down. Democrats, of course, ought to vote for this amendment, for our platform declares for this very thing.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMLIN. I will.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does my friend make any distinction between the matter of policy and the matter of power? I am placing my position upon the ground that Congress has not the power to make such a requirement; I am not objecting to the policy.

Mr. HAMLIN. If we do not have the power, then the President may disregard this provision of the bill if he chooses, but I am sure that he will not disregard it, for I believe he wants the people to know not only what he does but why he does it.

Mr. CULLOP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMLIN. I will.

Mr. CULLOP. Is this a question of power or is it only a question of procedure? Is not it only a question of procedure?

Mr. HAMLIN. I think this, that if the President should positively refuse to give the people that information I know of no way we could compel him to do it. I am frank to say that.

Mr. CULLOP. Will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes.

Mr. CULLOP. Are there not laws in certain cases regarding appointments, defining the manner of procedure in regard to them?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. CULLOP. I ask that the gentleman have two minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri have two minutes additional. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CULLOP. If the law defines the manner in which the appointment shall be made, what constitutional provision, if any, does that invade?

Mr. HAMLIN. Oh, I do not know that it invades the Constitution. I do not think that it does, but there may be something in what my friend from Tennessee says, that it is doubtful whether the legislative body would have the authority to say to the Executive what he should do in relation to making appointments. Perhaps we could not compel him to make public these indorsements, but I believe that the people of this country, to whom he is responsible, would hold him and his party responsible for refusing the request for this publicity.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield there for just a moment? Does not the gentleman think under his own remarks that the amendment ought to be amended so as to make it necessary for the President only to make public the indorsements of the man he does appoint?

Mr. HAMLIN. Oh, yes; with those whom he does not appoint we have no concern at all. I think the gentleman is entirely right about that.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the pending paragraph and all amendments thereto be now closed.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HARDY. The question is not debatable.

Mr. DYER. I do not desire to debate, but I wish to offer an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will have an opportunity to do that. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that all debate on the paragraph and all amendments thereto be now closed.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BRYAN. Division, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] demands a division on the question of closing debate on the paragraph and all amendments thereto.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 126, noes 23.

So the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by striking out the words "any applicant," in the second line, and insert in lieu thereof the words "the person appointed," so that the amendment will read:

"Provided, however, That the President shall make public all indorsements made in behalf of the person appointed as such judge."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the amendment as reported does not agree with itself. What the gentleman wishes to move to strike out is "any applicant for appointment." The Clerk read "any applicant."

Mr. HARDY. It should be "any applicant for appointment." I ask unanimous consent to modify the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment in accordance with the statement of the gentleman from Illinois. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment as amended.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. PALMER. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 85, noes 52.

So the amendment as amended was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That whenever a vacancy shall occur in the office of the district judge for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, senior in commission, such vacancy shall not be filled, and thereafter there shall be but two district judges in said district.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order. On the last question taken 137 were counted as present, which is more than a quorum in the committee.

The motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. ALEXANDER having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HAY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 32) to provide for the appointment of an additional district judge in and for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, and had directed him to report the same to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendment to final passage.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman will not make that motion.

Mr. PALMER. You certainly do not want any more debate on this little bill?

Mr. MANN. I do not desire to have any more debate at all. I am willing to come to an understanding that there will be no more debate. I do not know that the occasion will arise, but it might arise, and, if it does, this will be the unfinished business during all the recess.

Mr. PALMER. I have no objection to this bill being unfinished business. I believe it will be disposed of here to-day, however. There is a quorum present, I think.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding at the end of line 9 the following: "Provided, however, That the President shall make public all indorsements made in behalf of the person appointed as such district judge."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BARTLETT. Division, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays. We do not wish to filibuster and take up unnecessary time.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 171, nays 84, answered "present" 6, not voting 169, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. PALMER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

MOTHERS' DAY.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 103.

Whereas the service rendered the United States by the American mother is the greatest source of the country's strength and inspiration; and

Whereas we honor ourselves and the mothers of America when we do anything to give emphasis to the home as the fountain head of the state; and

Whereas the American mother is doing so much for the home, the moral uplift, and religion, hence so much for good government and humanity: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That as a token of our love and reverence for the mother the President and his Cabinet, United States Senators, Representatives of the House, and all officials of the Federal Government are hereby requested to wear a white carnation or some other white flower Sunday, May 11, in observance of Mothers' Day.

[Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to take the time of the House. I simply ask for the present consideration and adoption of the resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. Reserving the right to object, I hope the gentleman from Alabama who introduced this resolution will tell us something about it. We would like to hear at least a 10-minute speech from him. [Applause.]

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, the resolution speaks for itself. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

FRIEDMANN TREATMENT FOR TUBERCULOSIS.

Mr. NEELEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print as a House document a report on the present status of the investigation of the Friedmann treatment for tuberculosis by the Public Health Service, by Dr. J. F. Anderson and Dr. A. M. Stimson.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Has not this been printed by the Public Health Service?

Mr. NEELEY. It has not.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It should be printed by the Public Health Service and charged to their appropriation and not to the House appropriation. Therefore I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York objects.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—MACDONALD AGAINST YOUNG.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman will withhold that motion for a moment. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG] be permitted to address the House for one hour in reference to his contested-election matter.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG] be permitted to address the House for one hour on his contested-election case. Is there objection?

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I have no objection to the gentleman proceeding, but I should like to ask the gentleman from Michigan if he proposes to go into the controverted points of the case?

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Somewhat.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will there be an opportunity to answer, or not?

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. I take it so.

Mr. MURDOCK. To consider the merits of the case?

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Undoubtedly.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is not seeking to bring the case up for a final vote, but it may develop something that it is proper for the House to have.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Reserving the right to object, of course this presents a somewhat delicate matter. The kind personal regard I have for the gentleman from Michigan and for the gentleman from Illinois constrains me not to object, yet at the same time it is a very unusual request, so far as I know. I make no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question. It is now 4 o'clock, and the request is for an hour for the gentleman from Michigan. Does he not think there ought to be a chance to reply, if the matter is to develop any controversy?

Mr. MANN. I think if anybody desires to reply, he ought to have the opportunity at once.

Mr. MURDOCK. What about the proposition for unanimous consent? It will be rather difficult to obtain that at 5 o'clock.

Mr. MANN. I should say not. If there was anybody who desired to reply, I am sure that no one would object at that time.

Mr. MURDOCK. Do you think in that case I will be able to get unanimous consent?

Mr. MANN. I have not the slightest doubt about it.

Mr. MURDOCK. I ask unanimous consent that at the end of the hour of the gentleman from Michigan we have an hour.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Who?

Mr. MURDOCK. Or half an hour.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Who?

Mr. MURDOCK. Myself and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HINEBAUGH].

Mr. MANN. I think there ought to be no objection to that.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I couple with the request of the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Michigan the further request that half an hour be given to us to reply to the gentleman from Michigan. I will modify that request by making it an hour, an equal time with that given by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG] be permitted to address the House for one hour on his contested-election case, and the gentleman from Kansas asks that at the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from Michigan he be given an hour to address the House in answer to the gentleman from Michigan. Is there objection?

Mr. HARDWICK. Reserving the right to object, can not we do this on Monday?

Mr. MANN. There is a question whether it ought to be done on Monday, under the practical gentlemen's agreement that we had yesterday.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire some information. Whatever the gentleman from Michigan may say or do, as I understand it, it can in no way affect the legal status of the case of the contestant.

Mr. MANN. I assume that to be true.

Mr. CLAYTON. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois and the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, after 10 years of service in this body I have received from my State a certificate of election to the Sixty-third Congress and have been sworn in as a Member. My right to retain that seat, however, is the subject of a contest duly served on me by one William J. MacDonald, who claims to have been elected to that office as the candidate of the Bull Moose Party. The unofficial returns indicated that he had been so elected. Almost immediately after the result was announced I was urged to contest his election. I was told by one gentleman, in whom I had confidence, that for reasons he gave me he believed that in certain precincts he named there had been substantial errors against me in the count.

The campaign had been one of great excitement. During the 40 years in which I have participated, to some extent, in politics I have never known an election where falsehood and misrepresentation were so rife—misrepresentation so well calculated to prejudice the electors against me. Nor have I known one in which there had been so many suspiciously sudden conversions, conversions in some cases inexplicable by any of the ordinary rules that govern honest human conduct and in others so sudden that they made that of Saul of Tarsus seem, by comparison, as long drawn out as the wanderings of the children of Israel in the wilderness.

Soon statements were made to me, with a considerable degree of particularity and detail, of the alleged corrupt use of money in favor of the Bull Moose candidate. Nevertheless, I dismissed those things from my mind and accepted the result with that equanimity that waits on a good digestion and an equable temper.

Great was my surprise, therefore, on December 10 last to receive a telegram stating that the board of State canvassers, the body which in Michigan certifies finally the election of Representatives in Congress, had found that I was elected and had forwarded to me a certificate of such election.

It seems that the board found the result to be that H. OLIN YOUNG received 18,190 votes, William J. MacDonald received 17,975 votes, John Power received 10,322 votes, William O. Trezise received 1,077 votes, and Sheldon William J. McDonald received 458 votes.

These latter votes were all cast in the county of Ontonagon. This gave me a plurality of 215 votes, and the certificate was issued to me accordingly.

It is claimed on behalf of the contestant that the 458 votes cast for Sheldon William J. McDonald should have been counted for him. If so counted, he would have, on the face of the returns, a plurality of 243 votes over me.

I was asked if I would accept the certificate of election. The contestant had refrained from filing any such statement of his campaign expenses and the source of his campaign funds, as is required by law. A recollection of the gross misrepresentations of the campaign and the allegations of fraud naturally recurred to my mind. I believed that I ought to see what time and investigation would develop in regard to the entire matter, and so stated that I would accept the certificate of election. Mr. MacDonald immediately announced that he would contest. My refusal to accept the certificate of election would not have elected Mr. MacDonald. He would have been still compelled either to submit his fortunes to the chances of a new election or to have proven in this body a right to a seat here. Its only possible effect would have been to delay, perhaps for a considerable time, the determination of the question here. There was no tribunal in existence to which the contest could be submitted, nor would there be one until the Sixty-third Congress convened and the election committees were appointed. No one could be prejudiced by the necessary delay and investigation.

For so doing I was subjected to a storm of censure and abuse from Bull Moose sources and from a very few politicians from other parties who could not restrain their longing for Bull Moose approval and votes.

Mr. MacDonald then brought a mandamus proceeding before the supreme court of the State, praying that the board of State canvassers be directed to reconvene and count for him the 458 votes cast in Ontonagon County for Sheldon William J. McDonald. The court unanimously refused his prayer. To neither the proceedings before the board of State canvassers or to that before the supreme court was I a party or present or in any way represented.

I know it has been asserted in the heat of a political campaign and from high sources that the court had no jurisdiction over the question and refused to act because of this want of jurisdiction. This claim is based upon the fact that the House of Representatives, under the Constitution of the United States, is the judge of the election returns and qualifications of its Members, but that contention will not bear one moment's careful examination. It is true, of course, that the court has not final jurisdiction over election of Members of Congress, but it does have jurisdiction over the various boards and minor governmental agencies of the State, including the board of State canvassers, to compel them to carry out their duties in conformity with the law of the State. It has frequently exercised this jurisdiction over the State board of canvassers. It did so in the case of Wheeler against Board of Canvassers, reported in the Ninety-fourth Michigan, at page 448. Wheeler was a candidate for the State senate, and on the face of the returns was defeated. He asked for a recount under a State statute. The court took jurisdiction of the case and held that the statute providing for a recount did not apply to any officer who on election would become a member of a body that itself was the final judge of the election of its members, and so refused to order the recount. To repeat, it refused to grant the relief, not because it had no jurisdiction, but because the applicant was not entitled to the relief asked for for the reason that the statute he relied on did not apply to his case.

In the case of Belknap against Board of Canvassers, reported in the same volume of reports, namely, Ninety-fourth Michigan, at page 516, the Supreme Court again exercised jurisdiction in a similar case and did grant the relief prayed for.

Belknap was a candidate for Representative in Congress from the Grand Rapids district in Michigan, now known as the fifth district. On the face of the returns Belknap had a majority of 9 votes. His opponent, Richardson, asked for and obtained a recount of the votes cast in Ionia County. The recount resulted in giving a majority of 19 votes to Richardson. The board of canvassers of Ionia County reported the result of the recount, instead of the result of the first count, to the State board of canvassers. That board accordingly issued its certificate to Richardson. Belknap then applied to the supreme court for a writ of mandamus to require the board of county canvassers of Ionia County to reconvene and recanvass and report the vote to the State board of canvassers according to the original count. After a full hearing the supreme court granted the relief asked for and directed the board of county canvassers of Ionia County to reconvene and recanvass the vote according to the original count, and report the same to the State board of canvassers, and directed the State board of canvassers to again reconvene and recanvass the vote for Member of Congress, substituting the new return of the board of Ionia County for the one they had first made. This was done, and the State board of canvassers, under the direction of the supreme court, issued a certificate to Belknap. The supreme court based its decision in this case on exactly the same ground that it did its decision in the Wheeler case, namely, that the statute providing for a recount did not apply to officers who would become members of a body that itself was the final judge of election of its members. Wheeler asked for such a recount and was refused; Belknap asked that such a recount be set aside, and his prayer was granted. In view of these two decisions it is a little late for anyone to claim that the supreme court has no jurisdiction over the board of State canvassers to compel it to do its duty under the law.

The only logical conclusion, therefore, that can be drawn from the decision of the supreme court in refusing the application of Mr. MacDonald for a mandamus to compel the State board of canvassers to reconvene and recanvass the vote, and count for him the 458 votes cast in Ontonagon County for Sheldon William J. McDonald, is that under the laws of the State of Michigan he was not entitled to the relief prayed for. For the supreme court to have granted that relief would have been to reverse its own uniform and unvarying decisions for a period of 70 years.

No sooner had the board of State canvassers acted in the matter than the contestant, as quoted in the newspapers, denounced their action as "a dirty political trick." The chorus of denunciation was swelled by many newspapers which profess to be the special champions of honesty and fair dealing in politics. When the supreme court refused the application of Mr. MacDonald for a mandamus its members were immediately embraced within the storm of vituperation, which grew in violence as the time approached when it was expected that this body would act upon the matter.

Theodore Roosevelt, on March 29, at Detroit, in a public speech, according to the printed form thereof furnished by him to the press, said of these acts of the canvassing board and the supreme court, that he had come to Michigan—to ask all good citizens, without regard to party, to condemn the organization responsible for the theft and to condemn every individual responsible for it, whether by acts of omission or commission.

In particular it appears—

He said—

that it was the right and duty of the court to undo the wrong done by the reactionary election officials. Two of the judges who made themselves responsible for the wrong by refusing to undo it are now up for reelection.

And so forth.

Again he denounced their action as "swindling and cheating" and as "treason to the people." One of Mr. Roosevelt's leading adherents said it was wrong to describe Mr. Roosevelt's language as "an attack upon the court"; that it was only moderate and proper criticism. The people of Michigan, however, have just reelected both of the judges thus denounced by a vote of two to one over their so-called Progressive opponents.

The Washington Times, under the management of Frank A. Munsey, who on occasion uses his magazine as an adjunct to his stock speculations and in articles therein professedly for the enlightenment of the public booms stocks he happens to hold—the Washington Times, I say, in an editorial in its issue of April 10, 1913, among other things said:

But Mr. YOUNG is not entitled to that seat, was not elected to it, and got it only because a trick, a technicality, and an accident conspired to give a partisan election board the chance to issue the credentials.

No language could be used more directly asserting that the board was merely looking for an excuse to do a dishonorable and disreputable thing. Finally, the resolution offered on the first day of this session by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HINEBAUGH] contains this allegation:

Whereas the said board of canvassers of the State of Michigan arbitrarily and without authority of law caused a certificate of election to be issued to said H. Olin Young, when in truth and in fact said certificate should have been issued to William J. MacDonald.

And so forth.

This new exponent of decency and fairness in politics immediately moved the previous question, and attempted to cut off all debate upon a resolution of which the House knew absolutely nothing, except from the newspapers. The House, however, by a vote of 266 to 26, adopted instead the resolution of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], that, as my credentials were regular in form, I be immediately sworn in.

It may be interesting for the House to know that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HINEBAUGH] and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] have formally entered their appearance in the contest upon which they expect to sit as judges as attorneys for the contestant.

Why did the gentleman from Illinois, who occupies this dual position, and his Progressive friends fear debate on this resolution? Was he afraid the facts might come before the House? Did he fear that the falsity of the assertions in the resolution might appear before action was taken, unless it was precipitated?

There may be a grave difference of opinion as to whether the law under which the officials of Michigan acted is a wise or an unwise law. There may be grave difference of opinion as to whether it is a just or an unjust law. Many Members of this House may feel that in the wider and broader jurisdiction of the House it would not be best to follow the law of Michigan.

But before I take my seat, if I am given sufficient time, I shall make it so clear that no honest and conscientious man will ever again deny it that there was no trick and no technicality in the action of the election commissioners and canvassing board of Ontonagon County; that the board of State canvassers were not seeking an excuse to act arbitrarily or in violation of law, but that they performed their duty under the law in the only way they could have done it without committing a crime. Is that language strong? It is not my own. It is the language of the Supreme Court of Michigan. I shall show that the supreme court could not have acted differently without overthrowing all of its own precedents for a long series of years. The law applied in this case was not made for the occasion. It had been the settled law of the State for 70 years. It was almost coeval with the life of the State itself.

How did it happen that in Ontonagon County the name of the candidate of the National Progressive Party for Congress appeared upon the ballot as "Sheldon William J. McDonald"? Was it the result of a trick, as stated by Frank A. Munsey's newspaper? Oh, no. One Joseph M. Rogers was the nominee for Congress selected at the primary by the National Progressive Party. He declined to run, and some gentlemen claiming to be the congressional committee of the party, though they were not such committee, notified the several election commissioners of the district that they had selected William J. Mac-

Donald to fill the vacancy. Later, on October 14, 1912, the chairman and secretary of the State central committee of the National Progressive Party certified the name of the candidate for Congress of that party as William J. McDonald. The election commissioners of Ontonagon County placed that name upon the copy of the ballot and gave the same to the printer to be printed. The law makes it the duty of the board to correct all errors in the names of candidates when discovered. After this ballot was placed in the hands of the printer, namely, on October 15, 1912, a telegram was received by the board from Charles F. Hoffman, secretary of the State central committee of the National Progressive Party, in the following words, after the date:

Congressman twelfth district should be Sheldon William J. McDonald, correct.

(Signed) CHARLES F. HOFFMAN.

The board consulted and then notified the printer to make the change in the name on the ballot, and it was done. The telegram as received was introduced in evidence. The operator at Ontonagon swears that he made no error; that he took it as he received it. John Garvin, who was the instrument of the board in this business, swears that he acted in good faith, supposing "Sheldon William J. McDonald" to be the name of the candidate of the National Progressive Party, and there is no contradictory evidence. Mistake there undoubtedly was, but no trick and no technicality. The State central committee of the Progressive Party failed to take the ordinary precaution of having the message repeated or of following it by a letter of confirmation. The law requires that a proof copy of the ballot shall be on file with the county clerk for 10 days previous to the election and shall be open to inspection to all candidates and the chairmen of political committees.

This was done, and no one discovered that there was a mistake—no one discovered it on election day. It was due to the carelessness of the National Progressive committee itself. But the contestant and the members of his party, instead of admitting this patent fact, have made the welkin ring with cries of fraud, trick, and corruption. So much for that charge.

Now, as to the board of State canvassers: Did they, as stated in the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois, act arbitrarily and without authority of law? On the contrary, that board under the law had no right to inquire whether votes cast for a man by one name were intended for a man having a different name. Let that be clearly understood. Its duties are ministerial only. The certificate, issued on its findings, however, gives a prima facia right to the office. The board of State canvassers of Michigan is composed of three gentlemen of as high character, as honorable and as conscientious as any to be found in that or any other State. In this instance they performed a high ministerial duty in the only way they could perform it, without violating their oaths of office and committing a crime.

I noticed, sir, the other day, that three Representatives from Michigan voted for the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois. Do they believe that the members of the board of State canvassers—Frederick C. Martindale, A. E. Sleeper, and Huntley Russell—acted arbitrarily and without authority of law? I believe that each of them knew the exact contrary.

This is an old question in Michigan. The first case dealing with it was that of The People against Tisdale, a quo warranto proceeding to decide the right of Tisdale to retain the office of sheriff of Jackson County. It is reported on page 59 of First Douglass, the first volume of law reports of the State of Michigan. It was disposed of at the January term of 1843, over 70 years ago. It appeared that Henry Tisdale had received 822 votes, James A. Dyer had received 820 votes, Jas. A. Dyer had received 1 vote, and J. A. Dyer had received 6 votes. Tisdale was declared elected and assumed the duties of the office. The applicant, Dyer, offered to show by voters who claimed to have cast the votes for Jas. A. Dyer and J. A. Dyer that they intended thereby to vote for James A. Dyer, and it was also claimed that there was no other resident of the county named Dyer who had the initials "J. A." The court decided that the intention of the voter, when questioned in a judicial proceeding under the law of Michigan, must be determined from an inspection of the ballot and in no other way, and that votes cast for J. A. Dyer could not be counted for James A. Dyer, and that no evidence could be introduced to prove that they were intended for James A. Dyer. It further held that "Jas." was a well-known abbreviation for James and that the vote for Jas. A. Dyer should be counted for James A. Dyer. But this did not change the result. In this case, among other things, the court said:

These statutory provisions designate the acts which shall constitute an election to the office and the evidence of such election. The voter declares his designation of the individual of his choice by depositing his ballot in writing on a paper ticket containing the name of the person for whom he intends to give his vote. The law has provided this as the means, and the only means, by which he can effectually give evidence of his choice. The evidence contained in his ballot is made the foundation of the statements to be prepared, both by the inspectors of the election and the county canvassers, and also of the certificate of election issued by the latter. In The People ex rel. Yates v. Ferguson (8 Cow. R., 102) it is said that "the canvassers have no means of examining witnesses or of receiving any evidence besides what was upon the ballot itself," and in The People v. Van Slyck (4 Cow. R., 297) their duties are expressly declared to be ministerial. "They must ascertain the number of votes given, but they have no right to controvert the votes of the electors." In other words, the vote itself is the only thing which can be received and acted upon as evidence by them. This is nevertheless the very tribunal to which the law has committed the determination of the result of an election and upon whose certificate the elected assumes the duties of the office, with the full right to hold until ousted by the mandate of a higher tribunal. We are here to inquire whether, when the question as to the result of an election is presented to this court, testimony of different kind can be admitted.

It is not contended that the votes given for J. A. Dyer can be counted for James A. Dyer, unless evidence is admissible to show that the voters intended them for him. The name is required by law to be written upon the ballot. This is not the name of James A. Dyer. It is not the designation by written characters of that individual. The Constitution and the statutes having said who shall be voters and the manner of exercising that high prerogative. It is difficult to see how a different rule as to the evidence of the intention of a voter can obtain on an issue joined in this court from that which prevails before the canvassers.

It seems to be supposed that before a jury on an issue awarded from this court to try the rights to an office, the inquiry will be what was the intention of the voter by the initials used in his vote. This the relator offers to show by oral testimony. It is a full answer to such claim to say that the statute has not merely authorized the voter to express his intention by designating an individual for the office, but has required him to do it in a particular manner, to wit, by depositing a ballot with his name written upon it. Any other manner, however fully it should designate the person intended, would be ineffectual. The illiterate voter who is unable to read a letter upon his ballot and who is consequently exposed to deception by which he may aid in electing the very candidate he opposes, can express his intention effectually in no other way. The blind man may exercise the right of an elector, but he must do it by written ballot, though he may have no knowledge of what is written upon it.

The inquiry before a jury on the trial of an issue of this character would not be what the voter intended, but what intention he had expressed in the manner pointed out by statute, to wit, by his written ballot; and this, of course, would confine the testimony to the ballots themselves or the proper certificate of the contents. Extraneous testimony of intention would, of course, be rejected by a jury, as well as before the canvassers.

If we were to give a forced construction to the statute by which extraneous and parol evidence of the intention of the voter, not expressed by his ballot, were to be admitted, I fear we should adopt a principle of most dangerous tendency. Where should the rule find its limits? If, when an initial is used, the testimony of the voter as to his intention may give it to one whose name is not expressed by it, why should not the same testimony of intention change a vote given by the voter who can not read and finds he has been deceived and given his ballot for one whom he never intended to support? It is to be feared, too, that such a practice once adopted would open the door to constant litigation, and the frequent commission of the crimes of perjury and subornation of perjury. Such a result, it is true, ought not to be presumed; but we can not close our eyes to the tendency in that respect of the practice sought to be established by the relator.

Upon a view of the whole question we are all of the opinion that neither the canvassers nor a jury on the trial of an issue of fact from this court to try the respondent's right to the office of sheriff could go behind votes given at the ballot boxes to ascertain the intention of the voters.

We are aware of the decision of this question in the case of The People ex. rel. Yates v. Ferguson by the Supreme Court of the State of New York. The decisions of that highly respected court are always entitled to great weight; but in a question presented here for the first time of great practical importance, we can not surrender the convictions of our own minds to an authority whose reasoning does not convince us.

The question next arose in the case of The People against Higgins, reported in Third Michigan, page 233, and decided in the May term of 1853. The doctrine of the case of The People against Tisdale was reaffirmed.

The question next arose in the case of Williams against Cicotte, reported in the Sixteenth Michigan, page 283. It was heard at the January term of 1868, and the doctrine of the case of The People against Tisdale was again reaffirmed. Judge Campbell, in the course of the opinion, said:

But a more important inquiry arises concerning the allowance of testimony to show that votes cast for E. V. Cicotte and G. O. Williams were designed for Edward V. Cicotte and Gurdon O. Williams. It was held by this court in People v. Tisdale (1 Douglass, 59) that votes cast for persons by their initials could not be counted as if giving the full name. In People v. Higgins (3 Mich., 233) a similar ruling was made. Between those decisions the election laws were twice revised, and no change was made on the subject. The law has been acquiesced in. In New York the acquiescence of the legislature in the opposite rule was considerably relied on in People v. Cook (8 N. Y., 67). This would seem to render it improper to disturb the rule unless upon the most urgent grounds and unless it is one leading to very bad consequences. It is not claimed that the inspectors or canvassers can make any inquiry into the identity of initials with full names. If this is done at all, it must be done in courts. The effect of such a doctrine would be that the statements and canvass which the law designs shall be the evidence of all elections, except where there has been some blunder or fraud on the part of the inspectors, may be changed by means not in the power of those officers, who would be compelled to put a man in office, and who would be guilty of a crime in deliberately refusing to do it, and yet he would be liable to ouster by ballots which they could not count. I can not conceive it possible that the law can contemplate a case where a person can not lawfully obtain the evidence of title to office except by litigation. The statements of every board of inspectors and canvassers are required to give the names of all candidates written out in words at length. (Sec. 64.) In tie votes and in cases where votes are canvassed by State canvassers, these are conclusive, as already shown. In registering voters their Christian names are required to be shown in full (L. 1859, p. 483), and in the way in which our elections are conducted a person can not, without the grossest carelessness, fail to be informed of the full name of each candidate. * * * The intention of the voter must be shown clearly by his ballot. Hence a portion of a surname on the ballot, unless idem sonans, is insufficient. * * * The election laws contain so many evidences of a design to require great accuracy in all proceedings that it would not, I think, carry out public policy to recede from the rules formerly held by this court until the legislature sees fit to open the door. Thus far there has been great solicitude to prevent uncertainties and frauds. Until the inspectors or canvassers are permitted to inquire into identity I can see no propriety in permitting such inquiries by the court.

Mr. Justice Christiancy, in concurring with Justice Campbell, says:

The rule in People v. Tisdale was recognized in People v. Higgins, and has now been the settled law of this State for a quarter of a century. This rule has the merit of simplicity and certainty, of being easily understood and applied, leaving no room for discretion in the inspectors, and as a general rule is equally fair and just in its application to all parties. I do not, therefore, think it wise to disturb it by establishing another rule which, to me, may seem more sound in principle but which in its practical application might not be likely to produce any fairer results. The legislatures have full control over this question, and may change the rule when the public sentiment shall seem to require it.

The question next arose in the case of The People against McNeal, reported in the Sixty-third Michigan, at page 294, decided in 1886. It was there held that it was not competent to show by evidence that a ballot cast for Samuel Toley was intended for Samuel Tobey. Justice Campbell, presenting the opinion of the court, said:

We think the ballot as cast by the elector himself must be held to express the intention of the voter, and it is not competent to introduce parol evidence to show a different intent.

He stated as authority for this proposition the cases of Tisdale, Higgins, and Cicotte, above referred to.

The question next arose in the case of Andrews against Judge of Probate, reported in Seventy-fourth Michigan, at page 283, decided at the January term of 1888. Again the doctrine of the case of The People against Tisdale was reaffirmed.

The question next arose in the case of Ott against Brisette, decided at the October term of 1904 by a unanimous court and reported in One hundred and thirty-seventh Michigan, at page 717. Again, the doctrine of The People against Tisdale was reaffirmed In this case there had been a mistake in the printing of the ballots. The name of Christian Ott had been printed as "O. H. Christian," and before the error was discovered 12 votes had been cast for "O. H. Christian." On discovery of the error the remaining ballots were corrected. This case so effectually disposes of this present contest, so far as the law of the State of Michigan is concerned, that I quote it in full.

Grant, J. (after stating the facts). The sole question is whether the 12 votes cast for "O. H. Christian" should be counted for Christian Ott. The name "Christian Ott" is not idem sonans with "O. H. Christian." The names are as different as two names possibly can be.

It is conceded that under the decisions prior to the adoption of the present quasi Australian ballot system these 12 votes could not be counted for relator. (People v. Tisdale, 1 Doug., 59; People v. Higgins, 3 Mich., 233; 61 Am. Dec. 141; People v. McNeal, 63 Mich., 294; 29 N. W., 728; Andrews v. Otsego Probate Judge, 74 Mich., 283; 41 N. W., 923.)

These cases exhaustively discuss the reasons why neither boards of election nor the courts can enter into evidence to determine that votes for different names were in fact intended to be for but one person. Does the Australian ballot system change the rule? The argument in behalf of the relator is that, inasmuch as he had nothing whatever to do with the printing of his name, but that the placing of his name is regulated by law, therefore he can not be deprived of votes by the action, either fraudulent or innocent, of those whose duty it is to report the proceedings of the caucus and to print the name upon the ballot. If relator's contention be correct, it follows that, if his name had not been printed upon the ballots at all, still the ballots should be counted for him; or if the mistake had not been discovered and all the ballots had been cast for O. H Christian, still they must be counted for him. This would assume that everyone who voted the Citizens' ticket would have voted for the relator. It would assume, which is unusual, that every member of the relator's party would have voted for him. We must assume, in order to sustain the relator's right to the office, that every one of the 12 men who voted for O. H. Christian would have voted for Christian Ott. A voter might know Christian Ott and be unwilling to vote for him, but an elector might be willing to vote for any other man, and, though not knowing O. H. Christian, might vote for him. Courts can not assume under such circumstances that such votes would have been cast for relator. The law makes ample provision to secure the correct printing of the ballots. Section 3660 (1 Comp. Laws) requires that "the proof copy of the ballot shall be open to the inspection of the chairman of each committee at the office of the township clerk * * * not less than two clear secular days before such election." Had the proper officials filed this proof and had the chairman of the committee examined it, no such mistake would have been possible. We are glad to state that it is conceded there was no intentional fraud on the part of anyone.

We think the repeated decisions of this court in such cases are not supplanted by the Australian ballot system, and that the reason why neither boards nor courts can enter into a determination of the intention of the voters any further than appears upon the face of the ballot remains undisturbed by the present system of voting.

But this is not all as indicating the settled policy of the State. Since the decision of The People against Tisdale in 1843 the legislature of the State has met in regular sessions at least thirty-five times, not to speak of numerous special sessions. At nearly every regular session of the legislature the election law has been amended and there have been quite a number of complete revisions.

But no one has ever suggested that the legislature should, by its enactment, change the rule laid down in The People against Tisdale. Nay, more, since this controversy arose in the present case and attracted considerable attention, the State legislature has been in session for several months and no attempt has been yet made to change the law in this respect. It is a part of the settled policy of the State.

No criticism, so far as I have heard, has ever been made on the legislature for its failure or refusal to so change the law. No man, high or low, great or small, has raised his voice against the lawmaking power of the State which for 70 years has failed or refused to change this provision of the law. My colleague from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS] was an honored member of the legislature. I can not find that at that time by word or act he sought to change this law. My honorable colleagues from the fifth and seventh districts of Michigan were members of the legislature. I can not find that either of them ever sought to change the election law in this respect, and no criticism is made against them. My honorable colleague, the Representative at large from Michigan, P. H. KELLEY, has been for four years the lieutenant governor of that State. I do not find that he has ever used his influence to change the law in that respect. Under this law every one of these gentlemen has been elected to State offices, and from this law, in the case of a State officer, there is no appeal.

Notwithstanding these facts, notwithstanding that it is the duty of the court to enforce existing law and the duty of the legislature to change it, notwithstanding the fact that that court in this case acted in the only way a high-minded and honorable court could act, yet it has been assailed for such action upon the stump and the motives of the judges have been brought in question, their fairness and integrity doubted. All of the Bull Moose orators, headed by Col. Roosevelt himself, followed or perhaps preceded by one at least of the most ignorant of college professors and all the lesser lights of Bull Mooseism, Tray, Blanche, and Sweetheart, all have been on the trail of the supreme court. That honorable body has been denounced as following the letter of the law while forgetting its spirit, as reactionary, as hidebound partisans, as enemies of the people, as unworthy judges, and as guilty of swindling and cheating, while the real offenders, if any offense of omission or commission has occurred—the members of the legislature—have gone unwhipped of public opinion. Indeed, some few members of that body have themselves joined in baiting the supreme court.

Whatever may be thought of the rights of this contest, the firm performance of duty by the State board of canvassers and the supreme court must meet the approval of all right-thinking men and the malicious attacks upon them be a subject of regret and condemnation.

As I stated in the beginning, for the reasons then given, I concluded that I would await the convening of Congress, and in the meantime see what time and investigation would develop, and then remembering that a fact which can not be clearly proven is the same as a fact nonexistent, determine what course a man should take who wishes to do the decent thing in politics whether or not he receives the same decent treatment. That course I have pursued, keeping my own counsel and taking but two gentlemen into my confidence, one in this House and one in the other. I made no appeals for popular support and have carefully avoided the making of ex parte statements, either directly or through the medium of friendly newspapers, in order to create a prejudiced jury among the membership of this House.

I am convinced that if the 458 votes in Ontonagon County should be counted for the contestant, no other facts can be satisfactorily proven which in a forum governed by broad equitable rules would justify a verdict in my favor. I am also convinced that it was the intention of those 458 electors to vote for the candidate of the National Progressive Party. The contestant was the only person claiming to be such candidate, and while under the law of Michigan as it now is, and as it has been for 70 years, he is not entitled to such votes, I do not care to hold a seat in this House under a title that may be questioned by some honorable and disinterested men. I have therefore prepared my resignation as a Member of this House, and shall forward it to-day to the secretary of state of Michigan and file a duplicate with the Speaker.

In severing my connection with the House I wish to express my appreciation of the unvarying courtesy, kindness, and consideration which I have received at the hands of its membership.

My only regret in leaving it is because of the severance of ties with men beside whom I have worked, and whom I have learned to esteem. This is especially true of the members of the committees on which I have served longest. In the seclusion of the committee, around the table where important questions are discussed and mind meets mind in friendly conference, you come to know the character, the mettle, the natural bent of mind, the astuteness, the honesty, and, above all, the courage of the men with whom you serve; for after all, in these days in this body courage is the supreme test of the man. In a body representative in character it is inevitable that all phases of opinions and, to some extent, differing degrees of intelligence should be represented. But after 10 years of service here, reflecting on the conditions under which men are elected to the House and on the strength of the temptations here to palter with one's intellectual integrity in favor of what is believed to be popular and the greatness of the reward for so doing in temporary honors, I am confirmed in my opinion of the high average, unselfishness, honor, and courage of the membership of this House. And now, Mr. Speaker, the time has come when I must bid my friends in this House a final and affectionate adieu. [Long and continued applause.]

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, it would probably be better that no reply be made to the gentleman from Michigan, but he did indulge in certain criticisms that call for something of a response. The story of the twelfth district election in Michigan last fall is a simple one. It is so simple that once it was brought before the bar of public opinion, where all men might see it, the legal technicalities and refinements which obscured it have faded away.

There are 15 counties in the twelfth district of Michigan, and one of those counties is Ontonagon. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG] was the Republican candidate, and Mr. William J. MacDonald was the Progressive candidate. Under the law of Michigan the chairman and secretary of the congressional committee certified to each of the counties the name of the Progressive candidate. This was done by means of a certificate in which the name of William J. MacDonald was printed plainly and unmistakably. That certificate, a copy of which I hold in my hand, was sent to the clerk of Ontonagon County. Later a telegram was sent to the clerk of Ontonagon County by the secretary of the State committee. The telegram read something like this:

The name of the congressional nominee should be spelled William J. MacDonald.

The clerk testifies that the telegram when received read in this fashion:

The name of the congressional nominee should be Sheldon William J. MacDonald

The clerk of Ontonagon County knew William J. MacDonald——

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK. I will be glad to yield, though the gentleman did not yield to me.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. The gentleman surely does not want to misstate the evidence. The evidence has been taken in the case, and it has been specifically denied by the clerk that he knew the name of William J. MacDonald. There is no contradictory testimony about that.

Mr. MURDOCK. Oh, but the clerk had a legal notification from the chairman of the congressional committee that the name was William J. MacDonald. The gentleman will let me proceed. The clerk testifies to have received a telegram which read:

The name of the congressional nominee should be Sheldon William J. MacDonald.

The clerk of that county placed upon the ballot, in the Progressive column, the name of "Sheldon William J. McDonald." It appears upon the ballot in extraordinarily small type, naturally, by reason of its length. That, however, was not the only mistake in the Progressive column. At the very top of the column was the name Gustavus T. Tope, a misspelling of the name Gustavus D. Pope. When the ballots were cast in that county by the Progressives they cast four hundred and some odd votes for Mr. Pope, and they cast 458 votes for their Progressive congressional candidate, William J. MacDonald, who appeared thereon as "Sheldon William J. McDonald." They did not find at any place on the ballot the proper name William J. MacDonald, but they found on the ballot, in this small type, at the bottom of the column the fictitious name "Sheldon" prefixed to the name of William J. McDonald. The Progressive voters of that county, knowing that their candidate was William J. MacDonald, voted for Sheldon William J. McDonald.

The laws of Michigan say that the manifest intention of the voter shall be taken into account. There was no question about the intention of the voters in Ontonagon County, so far as William J. MacDonald was concerned. There was no question about the intention of the voters, so far as the candidate, Mr. Pope, was concerned.

When it came to canvassing and counting the votes for the candidates whose names were misspelled, the votes were counted for Mr. Pope, but those for Mr. MacDonald were thrown out, and Mr. MacDonald, by that process, was deprived of his seat upon the floor of this House.

Thereafter Mr. MacDonald applied to the court for a writ of mandamus and the court denied it, filing no opinion; but the court did not decide that Mr. YOUNG was entitled to his seat. The chief justice of Michigan, Mr. Moore, I understand, has said over his own signature that the court held that the Congress of the United States was the sole judge of the qualifications of its own Members, and it was for Congress to decide.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Of course he would say that if he said anything about it.

Mr. MURDOCK. The notice of the contest itself tells in detail the story which I have narrated here. Before I go into the question of the notice of contest I want to say a word on another matter, and I should not have replied at all if the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG] had not recurred to the first day of the present session of Congress.

It was not as a partisan of Mr. MacDonald that I arose on the floor of the House in his defense the first day; that is, simply because he was a Progressive. On the first day of this session I stood here and did what I did for Mr. MacDonald because I do not believe that the Congress of the United States ought to let a man take a seat in this body when it is evident that he is not entitled to that seat, and in our first maneuver here—the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] will remember—our main object was to get immediate action upon that proposition. The gentleman from Michigan has said that on that day, when we had everything to gain through discussion and debate, we tried to shut off debate. That charge has been made repeatedly, and I am glad of the opportunity to clear up the matter for our side.

If we made a mistake it was simply a mistake. It was not intended by the Progressives on that day to shut off debate. We believed that the previous question when moved would be ordered, that it would be ordered because of the feeling in the House that business should be expedited and thereafter on our resolution, after the previous question had been voted up, we would have, under the rules, 40 minutes' debate. Now, what really happened was that the previous question was voted down and that enabled the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] to offer a substitute.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MURDOCK. I will be glad to be corrected.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman will recollect that the gentleman stated that it was his intention to move the previous question, and I notified him that if the attempt were made to do that, the House would vote down the previous question, and I would offer a substitute and explain it and then move the previous question——

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman from New York——

Mr. FITZGERALD (continuing). I want to make that statement because of the gentleman's statement that it was the belief that the previous question would be ordered when moved, because the gentleman had notice in advance.

Mr. MURDOCK. I will say to the gentleman from New York that I did not understand him to say that after he had moved the substitute he would discuss it, which, under the rules, cuts out the 40 minutes' debate; and, by the way, that did not cut off debate here yesterday when the gentleman from Texas offered a special rule—but my understanding that day was——

Mr. FITZGERALD. That was prior to the adoption of the rules.

Mr. MURDOCK. When the gentleman offered his substitute, if the previous question had then been moved, prior to discussion upon the substitute, we would have had the 40 minutes' debate. Now, we were entirely in good faith upon that proposition that we were to get 40 minutes' debate under the rules of the House. The gentleman from New York discussed his substitute and then moved the previous question, which, under the rules of the House, precluded debate.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield? The rules had not then been adopted, and there was no rule at that time which provided 40 minutes' debate after the previous question was ordered.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman will remember we were proceeding under the rules of the previous House.

Mr. MANN. Oh, not at all.

Mr. MURDOCK. Or the practice based upon the customs of the House, as the Speaker ruled that day. At all events, we were trying to have debate and discussion upon this case. We were not trying to use cloture to shut off debate. And why should we shut out discussion? We had a plain tale that swept away the obstructing technicalities. The Progressive candidate on election day in the twelfth district did receive a plurality of the votes. MacDonald had been a public officer in that part of the country. Everyone in that part of Michigan knew that in the twelfth district William J. MacDonald was a candidate for Congress, just as the people in Wisconsin knew that the gentleman from Wisconsin who is sitting before me was a candidate for Congress, and yet, with that knowledge, the name of "Sheldon William J. McDonald" was placed upon the ballot; and the people of that district who wanted to vote the Progressive ticket saw the name of their candidate with this strange prefix, and finding his name nowhere else on the ballot, finding this name in the Progressive column, did precisely as they did in the case of Mr. Pope, whose name was misspelled. They voted for the name there. They voted for "Sheldon William J. McDonald." And if the 458 votes so cast in Ontonagon County had been counted for William J. MacDonald, as they ought to have been counted, Mr. MacDonald would be seated in this body to-day.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. MURDOCK. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER. Do I understand the gentleman from Kansas to say that in the Progressive column was the name of a candidate by the name of "Pope," which was misspelled?

Mr. MURDOCK. As "Tope."

Mr. COOPER. And was that counted for Mr. Pope?

Mr. MURDOCK. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. Did he receive approximately the same number of votes that were cast for Sheldon William J. McDonald?

Mr. MURDOCK. That is my understanding of the situation. I am informed, however, that throwing out those votes for Mr. Pope would not have beaten him.

Mr. COOPER. Now, once more. Throwing out Mr. Pope where his name was misspelled would not have defeated him, but throwing out the name of "Sheldon William J. McDonald" defeated McDonald?

Mr. MARTIN. Of course the duty of the canvassing board is to make a return of the votes cast for the various candidates. Does the gentleman state to the House that when making the return, although the name was printed upon the ballot "Tope," that the canvassing board returned that number of votes as cast for "Pope"?

Mr. MURDOCK. That is my understanding, and I have here a copy of the ballot which shows both misspelled names on the ballot. I do not think there is anyone in the sound of my voice who seriously disputes in his own mind that William J. MacDonald was elected Congressman in the twelfth district of Michigan; and if there is anybody here who does dispute it, I wish he would rise and say so. There is no one to deny it. William J. MacDonald was elected. He did receive a plurality of the votes there. No one denies it.

Mr. CLAYTON. We do not know about the case. We have not heard it yet. If the gentleman wants somebody to deny it in the absence of information, I will accommodate him.

Mr. MURDOCK. I am glad to have the gentleman's doubt.

Mr. CLAYTON. It may be that he was elected; I do not know.

Mr. MURDOCK. Now, there is another matter. I think probably it is rather trivial, but I do not propose to let it pass. The gentleman from Michigan, I will say to the gentleman from Alabama, charged me with being entered, I think it was, as attorney of record in the case of William J. MacDonald. The gentleman from Alabama and the gentleman from Michigan know that I am not a lawyer. But when I received a telegram from Mr. MacDonald, in Michigan, some weeks ago that there was to be hearing on some matter before a commissioner here, or some similar law officer, and saying that he could not be here on that day but would be two days later, and asking me if I would appear and ask for a postponement, I went before the law officer and asked for the postponement. With me went the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HINEBAUGH], and that is the extent to which I have entered as an attorney in the case of William J. MacDonald.

Now, another matter, and I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HINEBAUGH]. I think the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG] could have with better grace, in stating his case to this House, announced that he was not seeking to embarrass a man who was elected in that district. I think in presenting his resignation to the House that he should have said to the House that William J. MacDonald was the choice of the people of that district, and that William J. MacDonald had his best wishes in his efforts in securing a seat in this House. We are all candidates at times before the people, all subject to popular approval or disapproval, and we bow our heads in submission to the verdict of a majority vote. That was the sentiment of the gentleman from Michigan last fall as it was the sentiment of every man within the sound of my voice.

And the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG] issued a circular for general circulation throughout his district. I hold it in my hand. At the conclusion of the circular he said, as many another candidate has said in a campaign:

> I have known from the day Mr. MacDonald was selected that his name could not be legally placed on the ballot, but I have been at all times willing to submit the question between him and myself to the test of a popular election.

The popular election was held. A plurality of the people in that district cast their votes for William J. MacDonald. Through a mistake—an error on the ballot—Mr. William J. MacDonald has been deprived of his rightful seat in this House.

He came here, represented by those of his party, contesting, the first day, for that seat, asking that Congress pass upon the qualifications of its own Members, asking that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG] stand aside until this matter could be determined.

Now, in the course of events, with a public sentiment existing which has no patience with the technicalities which defeat justice, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG] has come before the House and has stepped aside—I suppose wholly without prejudice to the cause of the contestant. And I will ask the gentleman from Michigan if he resigns in that spirit?

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. In what spirit?

Mr. MURDOCK. That the people of his district did elect William J. MacDonald.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. That is a question for this House to determine, and I do not care to express any opinion upon it. I have expressed the opinion that while I was elected, while under the law of the State I was elected, it was under such circumstances, because of an error, that I did not care to hold the office, and it is for this House to decide whether the other gentleman was elected. I do not deny it, and I do not affirm it. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MURDOCK. Well, William J. MacDonald, who was elected, will continue his contest and seek to establish, to the satisfaction of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] and all other men who sit in judgment upon that case, his title to a seat in the House.

Now I yield so much of my time as is remaining to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HINEBAUGH] to the extent he desires to use it.

Mr. HINEBAUGH. Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to prolong the discussion of this matter.

I rise only to say this: I have no apology to offer to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG] or to this House for the part which I took on the first day of this session in presenting the resolution which I did. The action of the gentleman from Michigan to-day is all the apology I need to offer for that resolution.

And I want to say this: I esteem very highly, as a Member of this House and as an American citizen, the action which the gentleman from Michigan has just taken. I attribute to that action the highest patriotic motives on his part; and I believe now, as I believed the first day of this session, that no man worthy to be a Member of this House, knowing the facts as they were presented to me, could eventually come to any other conclusion than that which the gentleman has come to to-day.

And it was because of that fact, because I believed upon that day that if upon that resolution a hearing could have been had and the facts presented to the House the gentleman himself would have stated then, as he states now, that he did not care to remain a Member of this House, knowing, as he does know, that William J. MacDonald received 243 more votes than he himself received, although he might contend as a legal technicality that the State canvassing board of the State of Michigan had the lawful right to refuse to count 458 votes in Ontonagon County because, forsooth, the word "Sheldon" was accidentally printed on the ballot in front of William J. MacDonald's name.

And I sincerely hope and I believe—we have the word of the majority leader of this House to that effect; we had on the 7th day of April—that a committee, a proper committee, would be made up as soon as possible to hear all the facts, and to ascertain the exact truth and to determine speedily a proper and just result. And I sincerely hope and believe that the action taken by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG] this afternoon can and will in no way prejudice any right which William J. MacDonald may have before the Committee on Elections and before the House.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. HINEBAUGH. Just one more word, if the gentleman please. I want to say that I have in my hand volume 37 of the Michigan State Reports containing a decision, and that before the motion or the resolution which was presented on the first day of this session was drafted we had this decision. The decision is very brief, and if the House will bear with me I will read it.

It is the case of The People ex rel. John W. Jochim against Cornelius Kennedy, reported in Thirty-seventh Michigan, page 67. That opinion is as follows:

The People ex rel. John W. Jochim v. Cornelius Kennedy.

COUNTING BALLOTS.

Where John W. Jochim was a candidate for election in a district in which there was no other John Jochim ballots cast for John Jochim were presumptively intended for John W. Jochim, and should have been counted for him.

Error to Marquette. Submitted and decided June 13.

Information in the nature of a quo warranto. The facts are stated.

Attorney General Otto Kirchner and Ball & Owen for the relator. The law knows but one Christian name. Thompson v. Lee, 21 Ill., 242; Roosevelt v. Gardinier, 2 Cow., 463; Milk v. Christie, 1 Hill, 105; Franklin v. Talmadge, 5 Johns, 84; Erskine v. Davis, 25 Ill., 251; Bletch v. Johnson, 40 Ill., 116. See People v. Cicott, 16 Mich., 283; dissenting opinion, Id., 319.

Per curiam: At an election for city treasurer of Ishpeming votes were cast as follows: For Cornelius Kennedy, 392; for John W. Jochim, 380; for John Jochim, 18. It did not appear that there were two persons named John Jochim in Ishpeming, and there was an offer to show the contrary. Held, that the ballots cast for John W. Jochim and John Jochim were presumptively intended for the same person and should be so counted.

Judgment for relator.

That was the law then in Michigan, and it is the law now; and if the Supreme Court of the State of Michigan held in a given case that ballots cast for John Jochim should be counted for John W. Jochim when there was no other John Jochim in the district, then surely William J. MacDonald should receive the votes that were cast for Sheldon William J. MacDonald unless it can be shown that in Ontonagon County there was another Sheldon William J. MacDonald.

I understand, of course, that the principle involved in the Jochim case (37 Mich., 67) is not decisive of the question raised in the MacDonald case. I do contend, however, that it is one of a long line of decisions in Michigan, where the court established the rule that the intent of the voter, whenever that can be ascertained, must govern in counting the ballot. No honest man can truthfully say that there is any doubt about the 458 voters of Ontonagon County having cast their ballots for MacDonald.

Mr. Speaker, on the 7th day of April, the first day of the session, and at a time when Members of this House were being sworn in, I objected to the swearing in of the Hon. H. OLIN YOUNG, of the twelfth district of Michigan. I stated at that time that I did so on my responsibility as a Member of this House, and because I was reliably informed that the gentleman had not been elected, and thereupon I presented the following resolution:

Whereas the prima facie right of Hon. H. OLIN YOUNG, of the twelfth district of the State of Michigan, to a seat in the Sixty-third Congress is objected to by a Member of this House; and

Whereas the Member so objecting as aforesaid informs the House on his responsibility as a Member, upon information and belief, that the election returns of the 14 counties composing the said twelfth district of Michigan show that said H. OLIN YOUNG, Republican candidate for Congress in said district, received a total of 18,190 votes and that William J. MacDonald, the Progressive candidate for Congress in said district, received a total of 18,433 votes, a plurality of 243 votes over said H. OLIN YOUNG; and

Whereas the State board of canvassers of the State of Michigan arbitrarily and without authority of law caused a certificate of election to be issued to said H. OLIN YOUNG, when in truth and in fact said certificate should have been issued to William J. MacDonald, who received a plurality of 243 votes as aforesaid; and

Whereas said State board of canvassers refused to count for said William J. MacDonald any of the votes cast for him in the county of Ontanagon, in said district, being 458 in number, upon the sole ground that the name of said William J. MacDonald appeared upon the official ballot in said Ontanagon County as "Sheldon William J. MacDonald"; and

Whereas, for the reasons aforesaid, the Member so objecting has further objected to the oath of office being administered to said H. OLIN YOUNG as a Member of the Sixty-third Congress; and

Whereas if the foregoing alleged facts are true it would be manifest injustice to permit the seating, even temporarily, of H. OLIN YOUNG on his certificate of election issued as aforesaid: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the question of the prima facie right of H. OLIN YOUNG to be sworn in as a Representative from the State of Michigan in the Sixty-third Congress, as well as his final right to a seat therein as such Representative, be referred to a select committee of nine Members of the House, to be appointed by the Speaker; and until such committee shall report upon and the House decide such question and right the said H. OLIN YOUNG shall not be sworn in or permitted to occupy a seat in this House. And said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers and examine witnesses under oath in relation to the subject matter of this resolution, and shall have the right to report at any time. The expenses of said inquiry shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, upon vouchers approved by the chairman of said committee, to be immediately available.

For that action, Mr. Speaker, there was abundant precedent in this House.

In the first session of the Twenty-eighth Congress, on the 30th of April, 1844, the credentials of John M. Niles, a Senator from Connecticut, were presented to the Senate. Objection was made to the oath being administered. The objection was sustained, and a select committee was appointed.

Another case in the Senate was that of Philip Thomas, of Maryland, in the Fortieth Congress. His credentials were presented on March 18, 1867, and, upon objection, were referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Another case in the Senate was that of Benjamin Stark, from Oregon, in 1862. Upon objection, he was not permitted to take the oath, and his case went to a committee.

Again, in the Forty-first Congress this House asserted its right to exclude from membership a Representative elect with a perfect certificate and possessing all the so-called constitutional qualifications. That was the case of Mr. Whittemore, of South Carolina. The objection urged against him was that he had sold a cadetship.

I submit, gentlemen, that the objection urged against Mr. Whittemore at that time was no more serious than the objection presented in this case—that of accepting a certificate of election to this House with full knowledge of the undisputed facts in this case.

More than 40 years ago it was held by the House of Representatives that Members of Congress, being the representatives of the whole people, were entitled to say that the rights of the whole country should not be destroyed by one or more districts sending a man or set of men capable of their destruction; and that, having knowledge of the facts and the power to prevent the seating of such a Member by exercising the right to withhold the oath, they have the right to exercise that power, and thereby protect the interests of the country, and preserve instead of destroy the right of representation.

The House of Commons never held against the right to exclude a member at the very threshold, and since 1780 there are many instances where it claimed and exercised that right in the face of perfect credentials and where the ground of exclusion was not a want of legal qualifications.

And I venture the assertion that no case in either the House or Senate can be found, where the facts were not disputed, in which either the Senate or House ever denied that it had the right to exclude, even though the three constitutional qualifications were not lacking.

As I understand the situation, Mr. Speaker, the following facts were at that time and are now substantially conceded by the gentleman who now surrenders all claim to the office of Congressman from the twelfth district of Michigan.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.

MacDonald was nominated by the Progressive district committee after the man who had been nominated by the district convention had declined. MacDonald had been prosecuting attorney for four years and had made an excellent record, and was widely and favorably known throughout his district.

MacDonald made a vigorous campaign, and when the returns were all in from the 15 counties in the district they showed the following result, viz: MacDonald, 18.433 votes; YOUNG, 18,190 votes; Powers, 10,322 votes; and Trezise, 1,077 votes. MacDonald was elected by 243 votes over YOUNG, and the matter was considered settled by the people of the twelfth Michigan district. MacDonald was congratulated by everybody upon his splendid fight and great victory, and went about his business in a happy frame of mind, awaiting his certificate of election from the canvassing board of the State.

The members of this board met, canvassed the vote, and issued the certificate of election—not to MacDonald, but to H. OLIN YOUNG, and for the following reasons:

That MacDonald's name was spelled incorrectly on the ballots in Ontonagon County.

During the campaign efforts were made by the "standpat" Republican machine to prevent MacDonald's name from going on the ballot. Telegrams and letters were sent to the various county clerks in the district notifying them that under a decision of the supreme court of the State MacDonald's name was not entitled to a place on the ballot. This statement was not justified and, in fact, was untrue, but is indicative of the tactics used to clear the track for YOUNG.

The Progressive committee issued a formal circular to the election commissioners of the various counties in the district notifying them of MacDonald's nomination and how to spell his name on the ballot.

In this notice the name of Mr. MacDonald appeared twice in large black letters. There was no honest possiblity of mistaking it.

Some time later the Progressive State committee sent notices to the county clerks of the Progressive nominees, and in this notice the name of Mr. MacDonald was spelled "McDonald," but should have been "MacDonald." Upon discovering this error, Mr. Hoffman, secretary of the Progressive State central committee, sent a telegram to all the county clerks in this language: "Congressman twelfth district should be spelled William J. MacDonald, correct."

In spite of all these notifications the name of Mr. MacDonald was printed on the ballot in Ontonagon County as "Sheldon William J. MacDonald"; 458 ballots were cast in Ontonagon County for MacDonald.

When the State board of canvassers met they counted all those ballots for the mythical person, "Sheldon William J. MacDonald," and credited none of them to William J. MacDonald, for whom they were cast. By this means they made out a plurality for Mr. YOUNG, and gave him the certificate.

The explanation of the county clerk of Ontonagon County is that the telegram he received from Mr. Hoffman read "Congressman twelfth district," should be Sheldon William J. MacDonald. Claiming that the error was made in the telegraph office—changing the word "spelled" to "Sheldon."

The further fact remains that John Garvin, the county clerk, personally knew MacDonald—knew his name, and knew that in putting the name on the ballot as he did he was putting it on erroneously.

The official notice sent the clerk of Ontonagon County read as follows:

To the Board of Election Commissioners of the County of Ontonagon, State of Michigan:

You are hereby notified that Joseph M. Rogers, of Ishpeming, Mich., who was duly nominated by the electors of the National Progressive Party of the twelfth congressional district of Michigan as the nominee of the National Progressive Party for Congress, has declined to accept said nomination.

You are hereby notified that at a meeting duly called of the congressional committee of the National Progressive Party of the twelfth congressional district of Michigan, held in the city of Marquette, Mich., on October —, A. D. 1912, said resignation was accepted.

You are further notified that at said duly called meeting of the congressional committee of the National Progressive Party of the twelfth congressional district of Michigan William J. MacDonald, of Calumet, Mich., was duly nominated as the successor of said Joseph M. Rogers as the nominee of the National Progressive Party from the twelfth congressional district of Michigan for Congress.

You are further notified and instructed to place the name of William J. MacDonald on the ballots to be voted on November 5, A. D. 1912, as the nominee of National Progressive Party for Congress from the twelfth congressional district of Michigan.

The above is hereby certified to by the chairman and secretary of the congressional committee of the twelfth congressional district of Michigan by resolution authorizing them to do so.

N. L. FIELD, Chairman.
GEORGE P. SHIRAS, Secretary.

MARQUETTE, MICH., October —, A. D. 1912.

This is an exact reproduction of the official notice sent the clerk of Ontonagon County. It will be noticed that William J. MacDonald's name is spelled twice in large type. Despite this the name was placed on the ballot differently, and because of that change MacDonald is deprived of his seat in Congress.

In view of these facts, I submit, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Michigan could honorably take no other action than that which he has taken. I sincerely regret, however, that in resigning his seat he did not request the House to immediately seat the man whom he concedes was elected, William J. MacDonald.

Surely in these days of awakened conscience of public men, MacDonald having been fairly and honestly elected and Mr. YOUNG having refused to hold the seat because, as he stated, he could not honorably do so, there can be no doubt that MacDonald will be given the place to which he was elected by the voters of the twelfth congressional district of Michigan.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG] was awarded the certificate of election, I think the course which has been pursued in this case is the only proper course to have pursued; that is, to let this matter go to the Committee on Elections, and let that committee ascertain who was elected from this district of the State of Michigan as a Member of this House. I presume that as soon as possible after that committee is appointed it will take into consideration all the evidence and will make a proper report to this House.

Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman withhold that motion just a moment?

Mr. CLAYTON. I will withhold my motion.

Mr. MURDOCK. I should like to ask the gentleman from Alabama a question.

Mr. CLAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. MURDOCK. The manner of the resignation of the gentleman from Michigan does not prejudice the case of the contestant?

Mr. CLAYTON. Not at all. But the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG] having been awarded the certificate of election, this House must ascertain whether or not he was elected or the other man was elected, notwithstanding the fact that he has resigned. A man who is lawfully elected to this House may resign. His resignation does not elect his opponent. Notwithstanding the resignation of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG], the status of the case is exactly as though he had not resigned; because he was awarded the certificate of election, and the House will hear Mr. MacDonald's contest; and if he persuades the committee and the House that he was elected, the committee will so report, I have no doubt, and the House will so vote.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does the resignation create a vacancy?

Mr. CLAYTON. I do not think it affects the legal status of this contest at all.

Mr. HAMLIN. The contest applies both to the contestant and the contestee. Now, if the contestee resigns and leaves this House, you have an undecided case.

Mr. CLAYTON. He simply abandons the case and leaves it to the House.

Mr. HAMLIN. Is there a vacancy?

Mr. CLAYTON. I may say it would be somewhat like a disclaimer. He abandons the case. He leaves it to the House. But still the burden is upon the contestant to establish the fact that he was elected by showing affirmatively by evidence that he was elected. It is not a mere controversy between MacDonald and YOUNG. It is more, and involves the inquiry as to which one was elected. The certificate said YOUNG was, and we must hear testimony to establish the election of MacDonald, if he was elected.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from Illinois desires to address the House for one minute first.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the resignation tendered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG], in my judgment, prima facie creates a vacancy. On the other hand, it is not within the power of the gentleman who is the contestee to prevent the contestant from obtaining any rights which he may have. If the contestant in the end is seated by the House, that fills the place, and the resignation of the gentleman from Michigan amounts to nothing. There can be no question about that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, just before the House convened in this special session my attention was called to the fact that it was proposed to request the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG] to step aside and have the House refuse to administer the oath of office to him. I requested the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] to permit me to see the resolution that was to be offered in order to ascertain the ground upon which the request was to be made. I examined the resolution, and it disclosed that it was conceded that the gentleman from Michigan had a certificate, duly authenticated by the officials provided by law to issue such a certificate, and under all the precedents of the House of Representatives from the beginning, under such circumstances, unless some disqualification, either founded in the Constitution or law, or because of some grossly immoral behavior, the House had never failed to administer the oath.

The only recital in the resolution upon which the refusal to administer the oath was to be based was the statement that the canvassing board had improperly issued the certificate to the gentleman from Michigan instead of William J. MacDonald, whom, it was asserted, had received a majority of the votes.

Under these circumstances I prepared a resolution reciting the facts and directing the Speaker to administer the oath to Mr. YOUNG in accordance with the law and precedents. If any other course had been followed, it would be very easy for any Member to prevent the oath being administered to any other Member, regardless of his right to a seat in the House. It was not because I knew anything of the facts or favored one or the other of the claimants that I offered the resolution, but because the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG] was as much entitled to have the oath administered to him as any other Member then present.

Mr. Speaker, after preparing that resolution I asked, or somebody acting for me asked, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] whether it would be possible to agree upon time for debate. I stated that perhaps if I desired I would be recognized to offer the resolution which I wished to have submitted to the House and could shut out any other resolution, but it would be preferable, in my opinion, to have the gentleman first offer whatever resolution he wished; that as we were acting under general parliamentary law, unless we made an arrangement for debate, time could not be yielded nor readily controlled. The gentleman from Kansas asked if it would be possible for himself and those acting with him to obtain 20 minutes. I said there would be no difficulty, I was certain, so far as the Democratic side was concerned, and I thought it could be arranged without difficulty with the Republican Members. Negotiations were immediately started which would have brought about an agreement by which that much time would have been given to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK], an equal amount of time to the Democratic side of the House, and a similar amount of time to the Republican side, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] had made an exhaustive examination of the subject and desired to present it to the House. The gentleman from Kansas then notified me that it was impossible to carry out the arrangement; that those associated with him would not consent to any agreement for time, but proposed to offer the resolution which would prevent the oath of office being administered to Mr. YOUNG and then demand the previous question upon it. I called his attention to the fact that the effect of such procedure, if adopted, would be not only to cut off all debate, but to prevent me from offering the resolution which I had prepared as a substitute.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have only five minutes, but I will yield.

Mr. MURDOCK. I understood that if the substitute which the gentleman was going to offer was not discussed and the previous question was ordered, that after the previous question was ordered there would be 40 minutes' debate.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from Kansas notified me that the previous question would be ordered, and I warned him that if his associates persisted in that course I should ask the House to vote down the previous question, and I would then offer the resolution which I had prepared, which would permit the gentleman from Michigan to take the oath. I said I would then explain the situation, and as the gentleman had indicated a desire not to debate when my statement was made, I would demand the previous question and cut off himself and his associates. With that information the gentleman and his associates offered their resolution and demanded the previous question. It was voted down, and I offered the substitute. Then, Mr. Chairman, in language which I consider mild, I characterized the attempt of the gentleman from Kansas to throttle the House, after he had for several years been denouncing me on the Chautauqua lecture circuit as a party to a plan to throttle the House and to prevent the adoption of rules which would permit the individual Members to exercise their rights. I denounced him because of his attempt upon the very initiation of his activities as a leader of a new party to throttle and gag the House upon so important a question as to whether a Representative, with a certificate properly authenticated by the officials designated by the statute and without any disqualification alleged, should be permitted to take the oath of office.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. If the previous question had been ordered on that day, then under the rules of the House would not we have had 40 minutes of debate?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not at all. The rules of the House had not then been adopted.

Mr. MURDOCK. I think the Speaker so ruled on that day.

Mr. FITZGERALD. He did not.

Mr. MURDOCK. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that on yesterday the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] brought in a rule, discussed the rule, and then moved the previous question, and yet there was 40 minutes' debate after that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The rule specifically provides that upon any question upon which there has been no debate, if the previous question be ordered, there shall be 40 minutes of debate equally divided, but this was at a time before the organization of the House, before the adoption of the rules, when, as has been repeatedly held by the Speakers of the House, we were operating under general parliamentary law. It was only because of two peculiar and extraordinary decisions, which were followed by Mr. Speaker CLARK, that the gentleman was permitted on that day to make his motion to recommit the rules with instructions to report them with certain amendments. No one has ever gone so far as to hold that every particular rule of the House is in force under such conditions, except the one rule, that of the hour's limitation in debate. The gentleman knew, because I clearly stated what the effect would be, just what would happen if the course suggested by him was followed. I know that criticism has been heaped upon the gentleman and his associates since that opening day for their attempt to throttle the House. I know their anxiety to be relieved from that criticism, and I know the facts.

Mr. Speaker, I remember that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] delivered a lecture at some place in New Jersey, in which he spoke of the night of March 14, 1909. He described how he looked out of the window of his office in the House Office Building and watched the light burning all night in the room of the Speaker of this House, where he charged the Speaker and myself as the representative of Tammany Hall were plotting and scheming to prevent the House from reforming its rules; and I know, because I looked it up, that the gentleman's office was so situated at that time that he could not even see the Capitol from the window of his office. [Laughter.] And I was not in the Speaker's office that night nor at any time for several weeks prior to that time, and I had no conference with the Speaker at any time about changes in the rules. I was not a member of Tammany Hall nor was I its representative, but at the time I was engaged in a bitter controversy with that organization. Yet the gentleman made that statement about me in an endeavor to impeach my character and reputation as a Member of this House while I was here attending to my official duties and while he was off on the Chautauqua circuit delivering these lectures for pay. I do not propose that any Member shall escape the responsibility for his actions in this House, and I propose at every opportunity to fasten upon the gentleman and those of his associates in his new party who are responsible the responsibility for their attempt to throttle this House on its opening day upon the most important question that could come before it—the right of a Member with a certificate issued by the proper officials, duly certified, without alleging any disqualification founded either in the Constitution, the law of the country, or the practices of the House, to have the oath of office administered to him, so that the House might be organized and the people represented. I am not surprised the gentleman wishes to escape responsibility for his actions. I propose that he shall not do so if I can help it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for four minutes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I had an hour, and I will yield the gentleman four minutes.

Mr. BARTLETT. But the gentleman did not reserve his time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman did not reserve the remainder of his time.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Michigan have five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin has made a request.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin also granted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I am indebted to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] and to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG] for their courtesy. I have listened, as have all others here, with close attention to the proceedings this afternoon, beginning with the speech of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG]. The action taken by the gentleman from Michigan is in entire accord with what for some time I have thought he would decide to do. I say this because of a conversation I had with him last December shortly after we returned to this city for the opening of the session of Congress. I met him, and, after the customary greetings, remarked that I had read of the result of the election in his district, and then inquired who it was that had defeated him. He said a man by the name of MacDonald. I expressed my surprise and said that I had supposed him to be sure of reelection. "Well," said he, "it is the fortune of war, I suppose." I understand that he said the same thing to other gentlemen, one being the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS]; that is, that he had been defeated. When a few minutes ago he announced his resignation it reminded me of what I saw on this floor a few years ago, when Mr. JOHN F. SHAFROTH, now United States Senator from Colorado, rose after the testimony taken in a contested-election case in which he was the contestee had been printed, and said:

I am convinced, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House—

This is, in substance, his statement to the House—that although I have the certificate to a seat here, I am not entitled to it, and I resign.

He delivered an effective speech, as did the gentleman from Michigan, but he resigned. The contestant received the certificate.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. No; he did not.

Mr. COOPER. My understanding is that the contestant received the certificate and succeeded Mr. SHAFROTH in the House.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. He was seated.

Mr. COOPER. Well, he was seated.

The resignation of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG] does him credit.

It so happens that I have had a slight connection with this contest. The papers in the case were sent to me by the contestant's attorney, a resident of the city of Milwaukee, with a request that I make personal service of them on the gentleman from Michigan, and do this immediately. Accordingly, after looking them through, I sent my secretary over to make the delivery to the contestee in person, and also to the Clerk of the House, and then to make and file the necessary affidavit of personal service.

This is all the connection that I have had with the case. I say this in justice to myself, because of some things that have been reported as to my having taken an active part in this matter. I took no part at all, except that, when the papers were sent me by a personal friend, I did what I have narrated; nothing more.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, in reference to what the gentleman from Wisconsin has just said, I stated in my remarks just now that it was not until the 10th day of December that I learned of this error in MacDonald's name in Ontonagon County. My conversation with the gentleman from Wisconsin, which I well remember, took place before that time and when I supposed that there was no doubt about my defeat in any aspect. Now, there is only one thing I want to say a word about, because it seems to cast a reflection on the gentlemen composing the canvassing board of Ontonagon County. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] said that the name of an elector whose name was "Pope" was misspelled upon the ballot, but yet the votes were counted for him, although his name appeared as "Tope," while this was not done for MacDonald, it being cited to show, evidently, that there was intentional misconduct on the part of the election officials, or, at least, a different treatment accorded to those two gentlemen. The trouble with the gentleman from Kansas is that he gets his facts from the pleadings in the case and has never looked at the evidence. In the first place, that canvassing board was composed of one Republican, one Progressive, and one Democrat, and they all unitedly signed that report.

How did it come that the votes cast for this elector, whose real name was Pope, were certified as being for "Pope" while his name was printed on the ballot as "Tope"? In this way, as the evidence shows: All of the blanks for making returns of election were printed by State authority and sent to the different election boards in the various precincts. On those blanks were printed the names of the electors, because they were known. They did not print upon the blanks the name of the candidate for Congress or anything beneath that on the tickets. These precinct election boards, every one of them, certified to the county canvassing board that these votes were cast for "Pope" and not "Tope." They so certified because the name appeared as "Pope" on their printed form, and they did not go behind it.

Not one of them seems to have noticed that difference, but MacDonald's name they had to write, and they wrote it from the ballot. The board of county canvassers certified all the names to the State canvassing board in the exact way such names were certified to them by the various boards of election in the different precincts, and that is all there is to that.

Now, just one word as to the case cited by Mr. HINEBAUGH. If he had looked through the reports a little further, in Michigan he would have found that in a later case—I think it is in the case of the People against O'Neal, in the Sixty-third Michigan, where this Jochim case is referred to—it is stated by the court that the opinion in that case was very brief, but all that really was decided was that a middle letter was no part of a man's name legally, as has been the decision of nearly every court in the United States and England. The case of Jochim has no bearing on the present case, and the law in the present case is what I have stated it to be. My only purpose in referring to this matter at all is to show that all the officials and the Supreme Court of Michigan acted in perfect good faith and in exact accordance with the law of Michigan, notwithstanding the mendacious attacks made upon them by unscrupulous politicians and reckless newspapers.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think perhaps it is only due to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG] for me to say a word, although I had not intended to do so. The gentleman from Michigan talked with me regarding this case almost immediately after the statement was made in the newspapers that the certificate had been or would be issued to him. He talked with me in regard to it several times, and told me that he did not intend to hold the seat or to make any effort to hold it. I said to the gentleman when he first came to me that I did not see what he could do except to keep still. They could not issue a certificate to Mr. MacDonald, and I was inclined to think perhaps, although I was not certain, that it might make it more difficult for Mr. MacDonald to carry on his contest if Mr. YOUNG had meanwhile sent his resignation to the governor or done anything of that sort.

As I understand, there is some question as to the right of Mr. MacDonald to a seat in reference to a construction of the publicity; but whether there is in fact or not I do not know, and what the construction would be I do not undertake to say. But Mr. YOUNG informed me several times that he wished to get this matter before the House and explain it there. He did that just before he was sworn in; he did that very shortly after he was sworn in, and I must say I think he exhibited considerable patience. And, throwing a bouquet at myself, I think I have exhibited some patience in keeping still while so many statements were being made which were somewhat derogatory to Mr. YOUNG.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield? Certainly the gentleman does not mean to say that I intended to say anything derogatory of Mr. YOUNG?

Mr. MANN. I am not referring to anything in the House at all.

Mr. MURDOCK. I intended nothing of the kind in anything which I have said.

Mr. MANN. I referred to what I have seen in the press of of the country; but I will say that I did not see much of it.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 46 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, May 12, 1913, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, May 12, 1913.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou God and Father of us all, whose heart is ever responsive to our needs, out of the deeps we cry unto Thee for faith, more faith; hope, more hope; love, more love; that we may lose self in Thee, our life, our light, our strength; conserving our resources for Thee, since "life is a measure to be filled, not a cup to be drained."

It is writ "He that findeth his life shall lose it; and he that loseth his life for my sake shall find it." Thus may we lose, thus may we find the Christ spirit, which is life eternal. Amen.

House joint memorial 24.

FIRST REGULAR SESSION OF THE LEGISLATURE OF THE TERRITORY OF ALASKA.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the senate and the house of representatives of the Territory of Alaska, respectfully represent that—

Whereas the city of Fairbanks, in the Territory of Alaska, is situated in the center of a great placer and quartz mining district; and

Whereas the agricultural possibilities of the great valley through which the Tanana and Yukon Rivers flow are just being recognized and becoming known to the people; and

Whereas it has been decided by the people of the city of Fairbanks that in the year 1917 in celebration of the 50 years of the Territory of Alaska as a part of the United States a great exposition is to be held, to be known as the "Alaska Semicentennial Exposition"; and

Whereas it is purposed to advertise said semicentennial exposition most widely throughout the United States and elsewhere; and

Whereas the said exposition will be of great benefit to the entire Territory of Alaska, and particularly to the Tanana and Yukon River Valleys by way of bringing people from all parts of the world to the "Golden Heart" of the Territory, thus exhibiting to them the great possibilities in mining, agriculture, and other industries; and

Whereas the Hon. JAMES WICKERSHAM, Delegate to Congress from Alaska, has introduced into the House of Representatives of the United States a bill providing for an appropriation to assist in defraying the expenses of the said Alaska Semicentennial Exposition: Now, therefore,

Your memorialists most respectfully pray that you will be pleased to consider and act favorably upon the appropriation for said Alaska Semicentennial Exposition as asked for by the said Delegate to the House of Representatives from Alaska: Be it

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a joint memorial of the Territorial Legislature of Alaska, which was referred to the Committee on Territories and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate joint memorial 22.

IN THE SENATE, TERRITORY OF ALASKA, FIRST SESSION.

To the honorable the President, the Senate, and the House of Representatives of the United States:

We, your memorialists, the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, do most respectfully submit to your consideration the following facts:

That the larger portion of the Territory of Alaska is now well provided with cables, land lines, and wireless stations for the rapid transmission of messages;

That all such means of communication are owned by the Federal Government, except one wireless station situated in the town of Iditarod;

That the Kuskokwim, Innoko, and Koyukuk Valleys are being developed and opened up at a rapid rate and bid fair to become important factors in the progress and advancement of our Territory;

That all portions of said three valleys are hundreds of miles distant from any telegraph station; and

That a number of lives and much property have been lost, many and much of which might have been saved had there been any means of rapid communication.

In view of these facts, we respectfully suggest that the Congress of the United States provide for the establishment of one wireless station at some convenient point in each of the said three valleys, and that such stations, when established, be placed and remain under the management of the Signal Corps of the United States Army.

And your memorialists will ever pray.

Passed the senate April 22, 1913.

L. V. RAY,
President of the Senate.

Passed the house April 26, 1913.

Whereas the present cost of fuel and illuminating oil in the Territory of Alaska is extremely high; and

Whereas there are large known areas of oil lands of superior quality; and

Whereas it is necessary, in order that the large expense cost attached to the prospecting and developing of oil land, an area of at least 160 acres be allowed as an associate placer location: It is therefore

Resolved by the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska now assembled, That we respectfully petition the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled to allow the location and entry of oil lands in the same manner as allowed prior to the President's order of November 10, 1910.

Further resolved, That a copy hereof be sent to the President of the United States, the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives, and the Hon. JAMES WICKERSHAM, Delegate to Congress from Alaska.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a joint resolution adopted by the Territorial Legislature of Alaska, which was referred to the Committee on Territories and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate joint resolution 6.

IN THE SENATE, TERRITORY OF ALASKA, FIRST SESSION.

Whereas there was created by Executive order during the very last days of the Taft administration a reservation consisting of the entire group of the Aleutian Islands, in Alaska, for the following purposes: The propagation of fur-bearing animals, reindeer, fish, and birds; and

Whereas said group of islands are several thousand square miles in area; and

Whereas it is our opinion that no new reservation should be created in Alaska except for strong affirmative reasons showing that such reservation would inure to the greater benefit of the people; and

Whereas it does not appear that this reservation is necessary for the purposes mentioned above, for if such reservation or reservations are needed at all it would require but a very small portion of this vast area of land to cover the requirements of each separate proposition; and

Whereas we assume that the Government of the United States is not going to take up the propagation of fur-bearing animals on a commercial basis; and

Whereas we also assume that it is not going into any business of that kind except for the propagation and preservation of the species; and

Whereas the reindeer project has been operated under the Department of the Interior for many years and has prospered under that management; and

Whereas the propagation of fish requires but small areas for buildings and hatcheries near the mouths of streams; and

Whereas a very few square miles in the aggregate would cover every requirement for the purposes set forth in the Executive order; and

Whereas the Territory is so sparsely populated that birds are as well protected on the lands not reserved as they would be on Government reservations; and

Whereas all game in Alaska would be amply protected if the present game laws, which are practically under the control of the governor of Alaska, were fully enforced: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate of the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska (the House concurring), That it is the sense of this legislative body that the Executive order withdrawing this vast territory of several thousand square miles from the use of the settler and prospector should be revoked, or at least cut down to a few square miles in favorable localities: And be it further

Resolved, That it is the sense of this body that, owing to the fact that the Tongass and Chugach Reservations are of no practical benefit to the Government of the United States as reservations and are an annoyance to the prospector, miner, and settler, they likewise should be thrown open for the general use of the prospector, miner, and settler: And further

Resolved, That the secretary of the Territory of Alaska be instructed to forward certified copies of this resolution to the following: One to the President of the United States, one to the Secretary of the Interior, one to the Secretary of Agriculture, one to the Delegate to Congress from Alaska, one to the honorable the Senate of the United States, and one to the honorable the House of Representatives of the United States.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, do most respectfully and earnestly represent that—

Whereas the Sitka National Monument, located at Sitka in the Territory of Alaska, is one of the most beautiful and interesting attractions seen by hundreds of tourists who annually visit Alaska, contains 18 splendid specimens of aboriginal totem poles, and is the scene of the battle in which the Russians captured southeastern Alaska from the native tribes, incidentally preventing the acquisition of this country by Great Britain and thus estopping its subsequent acquirement by the United States, and this reservation is of scientific value on account of being covered with second-growth timber of 100 years' standing; and

Whereas said Sitka National Monument and the relics of aboriginal life thereon are worthy of preservation for the education and edification of future generations; and

Whereas said Sitka National Monument and the relics there are in a state of poor repair and dilapidation: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, That we respectfully and earnestly petition the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled to appropriate the sum of $5,000, said sum to be expended in the repair and restoration of the Sitka National Monument and the relics of aboriginal life contained there; and be it further

House joint resolution 9.

IN THE HOUSE, FIRST REGULAR SESSION OF THE LEGISLATURE OF THE TERRITORY OF ALASKA.

To the Congress of the United States:

The Legislature of the Territory of Alaska hereby memorializes your honorable body, and represents:

I. That at the entrance to Katalla River the wreck of the steamer Portland is a menace to navigation, and by reason of its presence at such place the navigation of said channel by small boats is rendered difficult and at times hazardous.

II. That if said channel is cleared of said wreck the result will be to facilitate navigation between Katalla and the oil fields near by, and Cordova and other towns where shipments are now made by means of light-draft vessels of the products of said oil fields.

III. That in order to increase said shipping facilities the small reef which extends into the channel near the said wreck, and which reef is exposed at low tide, should also be destroyed, as the combined influence of said reef and the wreck of the steamer Portland is a menace to navigation and has resulted in loss of life.

IV. That in the vicinity of the entrance to said Katalla River, what is known as Ocalee Channel leads from the Pacific Ocean to Controller Bay, and in order to make access to said Controller Bay safe for seagoing vessels the said channel should be buoyed.

Wherefore your memorialists respectfully urge that the Congress of the United States, acting through the proper channels, order an investigation of the conditions at the mouth of said Katalla River and in Ocalee Channel aforesaid, and authorize the improvements President of the United States, the President of the Senate of the

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a joint memorial of the Territorial Legislature of Alaska, which was referred to the Committee on Territories and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate joint memorial 24.

IN THE SENATE, TERRITORY OF ALASKA, FIRST SESSION.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

We, your memorialists, the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, do most respectfully and earnestly represent that—

Whereas the Seward Peninsula during the winter has a population of approximately 5,000 people, exclusive of natives; and

Whereas the production of gold on said peninsula since the discovery of placer deposits in 1898 has aggregated some $65,000,000 in bullion, which output gives promise of an annual increase in the future by reason of the new method of extraction of the precious metals by means of dredges, there having been during the last three years installed and there being now in operation 37 dredges on the peninsula, and the probability being that within five years the number of dredges will be largely increased, which dredges can commence working in May and continue until December; and

Whereas navigation usually closes the latter part of October, by the formation of ice in Bering Sea, and does not open until the following June, by reason of which fact, for the want of properly equipped vessels to navigate through the ice fields of Bering Sea, the dredge crews are unable to leave that northern country during the winter months, and should they do so will be unable to return at the time at which mining operations with dredges should commence, and thus from four to six months each year is lost, nor can much needed repairs and equipment be secured until the following spring, thereby entailing great loss to both laborers and operators of dredges and other forms of mining; and

Whereas during the past years the absence of communication by water between Seward Peninsula and the States has very seriously hampered and retarded the mining operations in that part of Alaska, and will, under the modern methods of working the placer fields and in view of the opening up and development of quartz mines, continue to retard such operation still more in the future; and

Whereas it is greatly to be desired that constant communication be maintained by water between Seward Peninsula and the States during the winter months, now closed to navigation; and

Whereas the usefulness and practicability of ice-breaking vessels has been thoroughly demonstrated by the Dominion of Canada in the Northumberland Straits and by the Russian Government in the Baltic Sea, under the same conditions as exist in the Bering Sea: Therefore

We, your memorialists, hereby respectfully urge the Congress of the United States to assist the people of the Seward Peninsula and northwestern Alaska in establishing and maintaining winter navigation in Bering Sea by means of properly equipped ice-breaking boats of modern types by making the necessary appropriation for building and maintaining them under the Revenue-Cutter Service. Such ice-breaking boats could take the place of revenue cutters in the summer and make semimonthly trips between Dutch Harbor and Nome in the winter, from November to June, inclusive, whose duty it shall be to carry mail and passengers and freight for hire. Your memorialists represent that such service, if so established, will also be of vital importance in patrolling the Pribilof (seal) Islands and facilitate direct communication with officers of the Army and other branches of the Federal Government.

And your memorialists will ever pray.

IN THE HOUSE, TERRITORY OF ALASKA, FIRST SESSION.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, in legislative session assembled, most respectfully represent that—

Whereas by Executive order of date June 21, 1890, Juneau Island, locally known as Mayflower Island, was set aside as a coaling station and Government wharf; and

Whereas the citizens of the town of Douglas have expended some $6,200 in the erection of structures and clearing land and other improvements in fitting up said island as a public park and recreation grounds for the use of the public in general; and

Whereas such public use will not in any way interfere with the purposes contemplated by the said Executive order, and there are no other claims conflicting therewith; and

Whereas a survey has been made of said island setting forth improvements thereon and its connections with said town of Douglas, an accurate plat of which is attached hereto: Therefore

UNITED SHIRT & COLLAR CO.

Mr. THOMAS. I have a communication from the president of the United Shirt & Collar Co., addressed to the Standard Press, Troy, N. Y., which I ask may be read and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the communication was read and referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

MAY 10, 1913.

To the STANDARD PRESS, Troy, N. Y.:

Referring to a recent article in your paper, mentioning our concern and reflecting upon alleged actions by them in relation to the writing of letters by our employees to United States Senators ROOT and O'GORMAN, we beg to say that no coercion, dictation, demand, intimidation, threat of reduction of wages, or loss of position, or any other penalty for failure to write such letters was used by us or by any person acting on our behalf, or was expressed or implied. We also desire to say that the statement that "simultaneously," or otherwise, we reduced wages or that there was any cut in the wages of our employees is absolutely without foundation. We take it that our employees, equally with ourselves, are interested in the prosperity of our establishment and in all matters which affect its welfare, and we are willing to leave it to the judgment of any disinterested person whether the so-called circular of May 5 was not wholly proper.

We ask that you give this communication as wide publicity as you did to the article referred to.

THE TARIFF.

Mr. BURTON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 3321) to reduce tariff duties and provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FLETCHER submitted three amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 3321) to reduce tariff duties and provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT TO INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MYERS submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $200,000 out of the tribal funds in the Treasury to the credit of the Blackfeet Indians of Montana, the same to be used for the promotion of civilization and self-support among the Blackfeet Indians residing on and having tribal rights on that reservation, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

THE TARIFF.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read House bill 3321 the second time.

The bill (H. R. 3321) to reduce tariff duties and to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes, was read the second time by its title.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is moved by the Senator from North Carolina that the bill be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I understood that that motion was made and that it is now pending, together with my amendment that the committee be instructed to grant public hearings.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state for the information of Senators that at the conclusion of the last session of the Senate it was held that the bill had been read only once and not twice, and, under Rule XIV, no motion to refer is in order until after a bill has been read the second time. In accordance with that rule the Chair directed the Secretary to read the bill the second time, and the Senator from North Carolina has renewed his motion.

Mr. PENROSE. That is entirely satisfactory, Mr. President, and I renew my amendment that the bill be referred with instructions to the committee to grant public hearings.

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that when I made my motion to refer at the last session of the Senate I was under the impression that the bill had been read the second time. Later in the day my attention was called by one of the clerks to the fact that it had been read but once, and, of course, as the Chair has properly ruled, my motion was not in order at that time.

Mr. PENROSE. That was all right. My motion is to refer with instructions to grant public hearings.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina has the floor.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I trust that the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania to the motion to refer to the Committee on Finance will not prevail. I do not think there is any necessity for further hearings by the Finance Committee upon this bill.

Early in December of last year, just after the November elections, the Ways and Means Committee of the House recognized that there was an almost universal feeling, not only in Congress but throughout the country, that in the interest of the public welfare as connected with the business interests of the country whatever changes were to be made in the tariff as a result of a change in administration should be made as quickly as possible, consistent with the great interests involved. Acting upon that sentiment and in response to it the Ways and Means Committee of the House, then controlled by the present dominant party of the country, decided upon a very unusual course with reference to tariff legislation, and early in December, more than two months before the Sixty-second Congress expired by limitation and the present Congress came into existence, the members of that committee decided to begin work in connection with the preparation of a tariff measure to be presented to the incoming Congress.

This was done, Mr. President, for the purpose of meeting the demand of the country and the business conditions of the country, so that, if possible, when the new Congress assembled the committee might be in a position at once to present and take up for consideration the new measure.

In January of this year, in furtherance of that purpose approved by the country, while the old Congress was yet in existence, the Ways and Means Committee of the House entered upon hearings on the various schedules of the tariff. Those hearings were continued from day to day for about one month, I think. I think they began about the 4th day of January and ended about the 1st day of February.

It has been said that those hearings were meager; that the great industries of the country were given only a few hours, or less than an hour in some instances, it has been charged, to represent the great interests in which they were engaged.

Mr. President, I have this morning examined the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee, and I find that they cover 6,330 pages of printed matter, not including the table of contents and the index. I have here in my hand the first volume of those hearings, which covers only two schedules in the bill, and they are not the most important schedules either—Schedule A, known as the chemical schedule, and Schedule B, known as the earthenware and glassware schedule. I find that the hearings upon Schedule A—the chemical schedule—cover 432 pages, and I find that the hearings upon Schedule B—earthenware and glassware—cover 510 pages of printed matter.

But these, Mr. President, are not all the hearings that we have had which throw light upon these schedules within the last few years since the Payne-Aldrich bill was enacted into law. Last year when the House schedule bills, so called, came before the Senate and were referred to the Finance Committee, that committee decided upon hearings, and for weeks, I might say for months, not day after day, as did the Ways and Means Committee this year, but at intermittent times, two or three days during the week, held hearings upon three of the most important schedules in this bill.

Those hearings cover 2,947 pages of printed matter, practically 3,000 pages. They were, as I have said, directed to some of the most important schedules in this bill, one of them being Schedule C, the metal schedule; another, Schedule E, the sugar schedule; and another, Schedule A, the chemical schedule.

Not only that, but in 1911, when the reciprocity bill of that year was referred to the Finance Committee, the then majority party, being now the minority party, and it was the majority party in 1912 when we had the hearings upon the schedule bills, caused to be held most exhaustive and extended hearings upon the reciprocity measure, covering, as that bill covered, more or less practically every schedule in this bill, especially the agricultural schedule, the wood and manufactures of wood schedule, the pulp, paper, and book schedule, and the free list. Those hearings cover in round figures 1,400 pages of printed matter.

So in the last two years, beginning in the summer of 1911 and ending in February of this year, the hearings that have been held upon the various schedules of this bill cover 10,777 pages of printed matter, not including the table of contents or the index.

Mr. President, the hearings that were held by the Ways and Means Committee——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I desire to suggest to the Senator from North Carolina that the hearings, about which he has just remarked, before the Committee on Finance on the reciprocity matter were all predicated upon the theory that we were to get from Canada a reciprocal benefit for the advantages that we were surrendering—that the vocations affected were to be compensated out of a larger trade by the people of Canada. The hearings that were then taken have no bearing whatever upon the present situation.

Further than that, in demanding hearings now we are demanding them because most of the testimony referred to by the Senator from North Carolina was taken before the present President of the United States assumed his office, and the President of the United States has asserted again and again that no legitimate industry would be affected by the proposed reductions in the tariff.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. What I want to know, and what I should like the Senator from North Carolina to tell me, if he will, is whether the present administration of the Government regards the woolen industry as a legitimate business or an illegitimate business, or whether they regard the sugar industry as a legitimate or an illegitimate business? The wool industry has enjoyed the protection of this Government for nearly a hundred years, and in only one single instance has it been attacked. Then the lowest prices that the farmer ever received for wool were paid.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I decline to yield to the Senator from Michigan for another volcanic explosion upon the subject of the tariff.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Well, Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina has the floor. The Senator from Michigan will take his seat.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. As the Senator from North Carolina declines to yield, I will speak in my own time on the motion.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I yielded to the Senator from Michigan for the purpose of a question, and the Senator, having obtained the floor for the purpose of a question, undertook to inject a speech.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was not discussing at the time I was interrupted by the Senator questions connected with rate making. I was simply attempting to lay before the Senate the extent of the hearings that had been had upon tariff bills during the last two and a half years, so that Senators might have the facts before them and be able to decide the question intelligently as to whether or not there ought to be further hearings upon this bill; and the Senator from Michigan interrupted me in the midst of that pure statement of facts as to the extent of the hearings which had been had, for the purpose of injecting a speech against the general features of the bill and which I was not discussing at the time of his interruption.

Mr. President, I did not rise for the purpose of entering into a discussion of the tariff, and I do not intend to be diverted by the Senator from Michigan into a discussion of that subject at this time. I rose simply for the purpose of discussing the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], and proposed to confine myself to laying before the Senate the facts as to former hearings upon the schedules embraced in the bill. I think I will be able to show that the hearings this year and last year and upon the reciprocity bill were more voluminous and equally as enlightening to the country as the hearings held upon the Payne-Aldrich bill.

Mr. President, if it were true, as the Senator from Michigan says, that the hearings upon the reciprocity bill were not of any great value as throwing light upon the schedules in the present bill, leave them out of the count, and there still remains the hearings held before the Ways and Means Committee this year and before the Senate Finance Committee of last year upon the House schedule bills, covering something over 9,000 printed pages. Surely the Senator from Michigan will not say that these hearings, covering every schedule in the bill, a part of them conducted by the Finance Committee when it was under the control of his own party, are not enlightening.

Mr. President, it is true, as the Senator says, that the reciprocity bill was based upon a mutual concession in tariff duties between Canada and this country, but everybody knows that the main question which was involved and considered by the Finance Committee in its hearings on that bill was the effect of putting certain of the great agricultural products of this country upon the free list, it being understood that practically our only competitor in most of the agricultural products involved were Canadian products, and the question was, What would be the effect upon these agricultural products of admitting like products from Canada free of duty?

I happened then as now to be a member of the Finance Committee, and I know about this; and while the Senator from Michigan was not a member of that committee, and I know that in those hearings all of the stock arguments used by the friends and champions of protection, as well as all the arguments used by the friends of a tariff for revenue, were gone into as fully and as thoroughly as if that had been a bill that was to apply to all of the nations of the earth, and not to Canada alone.

Mr. President, the hearings on the Payne-Aldrich bill in 1909 were regarded then, and they have been since pronounced, as the most thoroughgoing and the fullest that have ever been had by any committee of Congress considering a tariff measure. They were so full and so complete in the opinion of the distinguished Senator who was then chairman of the Finance Committee, Senator Aldrich, that he scouted the idea when that bill was referred to the Finance Committee that any further hearings were necessary to enable that committee to discharge its duties, and, as a matter of fact, a majority of that committee, the majority then being of the opposition party, declined to allow any further hearings, and there were no further open, oral hearings given by that committee.

Now, Mr. President, I sent for the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee held in 1909 in connection with the Payne-Aldrich bill of that year, and I find that the hearings then held cover only 8,345 pages, or only 2,000 more pages than the so-called inadequate and incomplete hearings held by the Ways and Means Committee during this year. When you add to the hearings of the Ways and Means Committee of this year the hearings held last year on the schedule bills and in 1911 on the reciprocity bill, it makes a total printed-page aggregate of 2,432 pages more than the hearings on the Payne-Aldrich bill.

In addition to that, Mr. President—I am glad my friend the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] has sotto voce called my attention to it; I had intended to refer to it, but it had escaped me for the moment—in addition to these hearings that have been held, covering 2,500 pages in round numbers more than the entire hearings held upon the Payne-Aldrich bill, since that time there has been the report of the Tariff Board upon the wool schedule, upon the cotton schedule, and upon chemicals. While I do not, Mr. President, place much store upon the Tariff Board reports——

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. SIMMONS. In just a moment, if the Senator will permit me. I was about to say when interrupted that while I placed little store on these reports of the Tariff Board, our friends on the other side, at least some of them—more of them now than when we were considering the Payne-Aldrich bill, because at that time they did not seem to care much about a tariff board or a tariff commission—now claim to place great store upon the information contained in the Tariff Board's reports as throwing light upon the rates that these schedules should carry. Now I yield to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, the Senator, in his subsequent remarks, has almost answered the question which I was going to ask him. He states in one sentence that the fact that these reports have been made is an argument for not having further hearings, and he then goes on to say that he places no reliance upon them.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I did not say that.

Mr. LIPPITT. I wish to say to the Senator——

Mr. SIMMONS. I did not say that; I did not speak that loosely. I said we on this side did not place as much store upon them as some of our friends on the other side, and I did not myself place much store upon them; but the Senator overlooks the fact that we are not asking for these hearings; we on this side are not asking for more light. You are the gentlemen who are asking for the hearings, and I am referring you to these reports of your own board, in which you now express confidence.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, the people all over the United States are asking for these hearings.

Mr. SIMMONS. I deny it.

Mr. LIPPITT. My desk is piled every morning with letters from my constituents asking that they may come here and be heard properly and in public. When they come down here, they are brought before a subcommittee of the Democratic majority of the Finance Committee of the United States Senate, and what they say goes into the ears of two or three men; there are no stenographers there and there is no opportunity of having what they state put before the country and put before the other Senators of this body, so that they can understand it. It is a star-chamber proceeding, and, for one, I am very indignant at it and protest against it. I want to have for my own use the knowledge that they have poured in here in regard to the most revolutionary tariff bill that has ever been introduced in the history of this country. You can not discuss a tariff bill in a few pages——

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator, instead of asking me a question, is proceeding to make a speech.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina has the floor.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not object to a question, but I do object to a speech.

Mr. President, during my political career I have avoided, as far as I possibly could, copying anything from the Republican Party, and I do not relish doing it in this particular instance. But when the Senator from Rhode Island says this is an unusual and a star-chamber proceeding, in that we permit representatives of an industry to have conversations with us respecting their industry, and then permit them to file any additional briefs they may desire to present to the committee——

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will quote me correctly. I did not object to people being received, and their views being considered. I object to what they have to say not being made public, so that all Senators may have the benefit of considering their statements.

Mr. SIMMONS. But, Mr. President, the Senator said this was a star-chamber proceeding, and that he resented it and the country resented it. I do not like to copy anything from the Republican Party. I prefer to follow different lines; but I want to say that if our present course with reference to this matter which the Senator has characterized as a star-chamber proceeding is reprehensible, this is one time when the Democratic Party has adopted the exact methods that the Republican Party adopted only four years ago in dealing with this very question.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Senator wants to be perfectly accurate, and therefore I call his attention to this fact, which I think he will admit:

The hearings that were held four years ago before the Ways and Means Committee of the House, consisting of some 9,000 pages, were upon the identical bill that later passed the Senate, with the changes made in the House and in the Senate. On the other hand, the hearings that were held before the Ways and Means Committee of the House in January of this year were not held upon either the first bill that was introduced by Mr. UNDERWOOD in this session of Congress or the second bill that was introduced by him. The first was No. 10 and the second was No. 3321. Neither bill had been printed at the time, and no hearings whatever were held upon either one of the bills.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator from Utah mean to say that the bill that passed the Senate, known as the Payne-Aldrich bill, was the identical bill upon which hearings were had in the House?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I said it was the bill that passed the Senate, with the changes made in the House and in the Senate.

Mr. REED. Does not the Senator know that nearly 900 amendments were made in the Senate committee without a single public hearing and behind closed doors, and has he not so admitted upon the floor of the Senate?

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President. I have not the number of amendments that were made, nor do I think there were 900 amendments; but I do not care how many amendments were made. It was the bill that was introduced in the House. After the bill was introduced in the House it was changed upon the floor of the House, and then it came to the Senate, and it was changed in many instances in the Senate.

I will admit to the Senator, as I have on many occasions, that hearings on that bill were held by the Finance Committee of the Senate; but the chairman of the committee and the majority of its members thought then that the hearings should not be reported on account of the fact that hearings had been held upon that identical bill, as has been said in this case, by the Senator from North Carolina. There was not a Senator, there was not a Member of the House of Representatives, there was not a representative of any business interest in the United States that wanted to be heard but that was heard by the full Republican membership of the Finance Committee.

Mr. SIMMONS. Exactly; just what is happening now.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no, Mr. President; that is not what is happening now, at all.

Mr. SIMMONS. Absolutely.

Mr. SMOOT. They have this bill now parceled out in schedules. Three of the majority members of the Finance Committee are hearing one particular schedule, and three of them are hearing another particular schedule. The Democratic members of the committee are not meeting as a whole.

Mr. STONE. That is just what you did.

Mr. SMOOT. No; that is not just what we did, at all.

Mr. STONE. It is just what the Senator from Utah individually did.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, that is not what we did, at all. The Republican members of the Finance Committee sat every day for nearly two months; and, as I stated, no one was refused an opportunity to appear before the Republican members of the committee and say what he had to say in relation to the bill as it passed the House.

Mr. SIMMONS. And you did not have any of those hearings taken down by a stenographer, or published and given to the minority membership of the committee, or to the country.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have stated that the hearings were not reported, and no one has ever claimed that they were reported.

Mr. STONE. And the Senator from Utah will not deny that he personally sat and conducted many of these hearings alone, and reported the result of them to his colleagues.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I heard, just as I am hearing to-day, representatives from all of the business interests of the country. My office is full from morning till night when I am there. I heard in 1909 the same identical representatives, in many instances, and in the same identical way. But I wish to say to the Senator from Missouri that those same representatives appeared and made their statements before the committee, and I think that is just what they all ought to do.

Mr. STONE. Not the whole committee.

Mr. SMOOT. I mean the Republican members of the committee.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator from Utah has finished his speech in my time, I will proceed.

Mr. SMOOT. I had no speech to make, Mr. President. I beg the Senator's pardon if I have disturbed the course of his remarks.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was willing to yield for a question, but the Senator has followed the example of the other two Senators who have interrupted me and sought to make speeches in my time.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I was asked a question by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], and I answered him.

Mr. SIMMONS. Well, let that pass.

With reference to what is now going on before the committee, I want to say that, entering fully into the spirit which had actuated the House of Representatives in taking up the consideration of this bill almost immediately after the last election, and which actuated the members of the Ways and Means Committee, who, instead of going home to take a vacation like the other Representatives, stayed here during the entire recess between the adjournment of the regular session of the Senate and the opening of the special session working upon this bill in order that its passage might be expedited and that the business interests of the country might know what changes were going to be made and adjust their business to them, almost immediately after the Underwood bill was introduced in the House of Representatives, after having been approved by the caucus of the dominant party, assuming that the bill would pass the House substantially as it was reported by the committee, the majority members of the Finance Committee decided to begin the consideration of that bill in the hope that in a very brief period of time after it was brought to the Senate we might be able to report it back to the Senate and thereby secure speedier action upon it. We recognized that the question of further hearings probably would be pressed by our friends on the other side, notwithstanding the fact that under similar circumstances they had not permitted further hearings, and a meeting of the full committee was called to deal with that matter. At that meeting of the committee the question as to whether there was any necessity for further hearings was gone into, and this resolution was adopted by the committee:

Resolved, That in view of the extended hearings upon the tariff which have been given by the committees of Congress during recent years, and by the House Ways and Means Committee during the present year, and which have been printed and placed at the disposal of this committee and others, it is the opinion of this committee that no further hearings are necessary, but that the committee and individual members of the committee will be glad to have anyone interested therein prepare and file for consideration such written briefs, statements, depositions, or memorials as they may desire, relating to any schedule or schedules, item or items, contained in House bill 3321, or the general policy of such bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Caroline yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. Did I understand the Senator correctly to say that that resolution was passed, not by the committee, notwithstanding it is stated in the resolution that it is the action of the committee, but by the Democratic members of the committee?

Mr. SIMMONS. The full committee passed it. Of course, I may say to the Senator, if that is the point he is making, that is was passed by a strictly party vote.

Mr. GALLINGER. But it was before the full committee?

Mr. SIMMONS. It was before the full committee.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is all I wanted to know.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from New Hampshire, I think, was not present, but he was voted by his party colleagues against the resolution. That resolution provided for the treatment of this matter by the majority members of the Finance Committee—and, so far as that is concerned, by the total membership of the Finance Committee—in identically the same way that the Aldrich committee in 1909 proceeded with reference to the bill of that year. In pursuance of that resolution we announced through the newspapers of the country that if any interests desired to file supplemental statements or briefs, they would be permitted to do so.

The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] says, however, that at the time the hearings took place over in the House this year no bill had been framed and presented to the House, and that that differentiates the present situation from the Payne-Aldrich situation five years ago. Mr. President, I think that is immaterial. Gentlemen have been told when they have come to see us, and have been told through the press, that if they desired to add anything to what they had said before the Ways and Means Committee this year or last year they might do it in writing; and as Senators on the other side who are members of the committee know, representatives of these industries have come to the Capitol during this year just as they came during 1909. I do not know whether or not so many of them have come; but they have come, and have sought and been allowed hearings by the subcommittee and by the individual members of the committee.

The Senator says that the full committee of the majority heard them in 1909. I do not consider it material whether the full committee hears these gentlemen on every schedule or whether a subcommittee of two or three hears them upon certain schedules; in either case they have an opportunity to be heard before action is taken, and that is the material thing; and their brief and written statement are open and accessible to the full committee and to individual Senators desirous of seeing them.

There gentlemen have sought us, and they have not sought us in vain. They have been generally representatives of industries that have enjoyed protection under Republican measures; still, we have heard them. I believe the majority of the gentlemen who have come here have not only talked to the members of the subcommittee, and to myself as chairman of the committee, but they have talked to most of the individual members of the committee, and they have taken up a great deal of our time. Whenever they have come to talk with me—and I assume that is so with reference to the members of the subcommittees—and have made statements, at the conclusion of those statements I have invariably said to them: "I should be very glad if you would put these statements in writing, either by way of brief or letter, or in any other form you may desire."

In very many instances these gentlemen have followed our suggestion and filed additional briefs or statements. Those statements are on file in the committee; and I want to say now to the Senators representing the other side of the Chamber on this committee that they are open to them or to any Senator in this body.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. SIMMONS. I should be glad if the Senator would just let me finish this statement.

Mr. LIPPITT. I was only going to ask one simple question; that is, whether the Senator proposes to have printed the briefs that are on file or to retain them in the files of the committee?

Mr. SIMMONS. Personally I shall favor printing them. At the next meeting of the committee it is my purpose to ask consideration of that question. A volume of briefs would probably be more generally read by members of the Senate than these long drawn-out hearings, full of immaterial and impertinent matter.

Mr. LIPPITT. Inasmuch as the Senator is going to have them printed, I should like to suggest that they be printed immediately, so that they may be available for the information of members of the Senate generally.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will say to the Senator that the briefs are still being filed, but that at the next meeting of the committee it is my purpose to ask action upon the question.

The Senator from Rhode Island said that the manufacturers and the protected industries of the country were not satisfied with the opportunity being given by the committee. I do not agree with the Senator. Numbers of these gentlemen, who have come to see me and file supplemental briefs, have expressed the opinion that additional hearings were not necessary. On yesterday representatives of two industries came to my rooms, and, after discussing this matter with me, asked me if we were going to have any further hearings. I said I hoped not; that I hoped the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] would be defeated. They both said, "I hope not, too."

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SIMMONS. In just a moment. I do not believe there is any general demand coming from representatives of these industries for a prolongation of these hearings, which, in many instances, Mr. President, are nothing more than set speeches praising and extolling the virtues of protection and denouncing a tariff for revenue as free trade.

I now yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PENROSE. Has the Senator any objection to naming the two manufacturers who objected?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not think it is necessary. I will give the Senator the names, if he wants to know who they are.

Mr. PENROSE. Probably they have been pretty well taken care of in this bill; I do not know, because the star-chamber proceeding seems to apply to them.

Mr. SIMMONS. One of them was here seeking a change in the rates in the bill.

Mr. PENROSE. I will ask whether they came from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. One of them came from Texas and one from North Carolina and one from up North.

Mr. PENROSE. There are three now. The Senator had only two before.

Mr. SIMMONS. There were two who came together. Gentlemen on the other side are exceedingly technical to-day.

Mr. PENROSE. Then, the star chamber contained three men yesterday?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I said representatives of two industries.

Mr. PENROSE. Were they importers?

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, Mr. President, I am sure they were not importers.

Mr. PENROSE. There are rumors of importers frequently——

Mr. SIMMONS. They were not importers, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. PENROSE. Importers are said to have broken into the star chamber——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if there is any star-chamber proceeding going on, it is following the course mapped out to us by the Senator from Pennsylvania and his great chieftain, who no longer occupies a seat in this Chamber.

Mr. PENROSE. Will their statement be among these?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; one of them presented a supplemental brief—in fact, both of them, I believe.

Mr. PENROSE. One more question. Will these three statements be in the printed briefs already referred to?

Mr. SIMMONS. I said they were representatives of two industries. Both of them left supplemental briefs. I will show the briefs to the Senator in the morning, if he wants to see them.

Mr. President, I have already detained the Senate longer upon this question than I intended. I do not believe that there is any serious desire on the part of Senators on the other side for further hearings in this matter. If the Senators on the other side desire further oral hearings, I submit the time for them to have made this motion was immediately after the Finance Committee—three weeks ago—voted upon the resolution which I have read, declining to have hearings.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SIMMONS. In just a moment. The motion was as pertinent then as it is now. If these gentlemen are sincere in their request for hearings, I ask why, immediately after the committee voted down oral hearings, they did not come here and make the motion and save us the great loss and expenditure of time involved in hearing the gentlemen who have come here and asked of us an audience? Three weeks of valuable time would have been saved.

Mr. PENROSE. If the Senator does not object to being interrupted at this time——

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I do not.

Mr. PENROSE. The junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] early made inquiry of the chairman of the Finance Committee as to whether hearings would be granted; and I then gave notice that when the bill came here and the motion would be in order and the Senator from North Carolina made a motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Finance, I would move to amend it by instructing the committee to hold public hearings. The motion would not have been in order before that time.

Moreover, Mr. President, the bill was then in a secret conference in the House for some two weeks, an extraordinary method of conducting legislative procedure. There were no stenographers, there was no audience in the galleries, and there was no one to witness the murder of American industries. We did not know what was going to happen; we did not know what kind of a bill would come out of the dark secrecy of that proceeding.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the Senator is seeking to make another of his pyrotechnic speeches.

Mr. PENROSE. I will not term it a star-chamber proceeding, because that disturbs the Senator. I think I will borrow a term used by the Democracy three years ago and call it a rather vigorous imitation of the methods of the Spanish inquisition.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I have no recollection of the Senator having given any such notice as he states, but I do know that the motion was a pertinent one immediately upon the action of the Senate committee; and I say these gentlemen have delayed this matter with a full knowledge that if we were to have hearings after such a postponement of the motion it was necessary that we should be subjected to the waste of time incident to the hearings of all the representatives of these industries which have taken place.

Now, Mr. President, I do not think further hearings are necessary and I do not think the country wants them. If the Senators on the other side want them, it is not to get more light on these schedules but to give the representatives of the protected industries further opportunity to exploit their grievances against the people, because they ask relief from the burdens placed upon them by the Republican Party, and to enable them in this forum to seek an appeal from the judgment of the people of this country in the last election——

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SIMMONS. In a minute. And to exploit the views of that element of the Republican Party who, like the Senator from Pennsylvania, do not believe that a hair should be touched upon the rates of the Payne-Aldrich law, who stand before the country for standpatism, and who are opposed to any reduction, however slight, in the rates of the present law.

I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator made a statement which grated rather harshly upon my ears in expressing his contempt and disregard for hearings. He also referred to the utter lack of necessity for long speeches. He certainly does not remember that brilliant and prolonged effort of his own four years ago when he held the rapt attention of the Senate for four days in advocating a duty on lumber.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I voted for a duty of 7 cents on lumber, and I did it because the bill then under consideration—the Payne-Aldrich, of which the lumber schedule was a part—carried duties of from about 45 to 50 per cent upon everything that entered into the manufacture of lumber and constituted a part of the cost of its production. I said in that speech if you will take those excessive and burdensome duties, which the lumberman had to pay, off the machinery and other things that entered so largely into the cost of his product, I would vote to put lumber on the free list. I was against putting it on the free list while these heavy Payne-Aldrich rates, which constituted such a heavy charge against his product, were retained.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. PENROSE. The energy of the Senator now recalls his energy during that speech on lumber.

Mr. SIMMONS. I did not catch what the Senator said.

Mr. PENROSE. It was a polite reference to the Senator's recent statement. But I should like to ask the Senator whether he still advocates the rates which he then advocated on lumber when he called the attention of the Senate to the desolation which would prevail in different States of the South if Canadian lumber was permitted to pass over the American border free?

Mr. SIMMONS. This bill does the very thing that I then said if it were done I would be in favor of free lumber. We have greatly reduced or put on the free list the duties of the Payne-Aldrich law upon the things that enter into the cost of the manufactures of lumber, and I shall with pleasure vote for free lumber.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. REED. I thought the Senator was through.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I had not yielded the floor.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. BRISTOW. I want to offer an amendment to the bill when the Senator is through and to make a very brief statement in regard to it. I did not want to ask the Senator a question at all. I thought he was going to yield the floor. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am going to yield the floor. I am about through.

Mr. KERN. Will the Senator from North Carolina yield to me?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. KERN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. THOMAS obtained the floor.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. BRISTOW. I desire to submit an amendment at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the amendment be read.

Mr. BRISTOW. I will explain it, if the Senator will allow me. I wish to make a brief statement.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is all right.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, the amendment which I offer to the sugar schedule of the tariff bill provides a duty of $1.52½ per hundred pounds on refined sugar for three years, when the duty is then reduced to $1.40 per hundred pounds, which duty stands for three years, and at the end of that period it is then reduced to $1.27½ per hundred.

The duties on "96 Cuban sugar," which is the real protective tariff duty on sugar, under this amendment will be $1.14 for the first three years, $1.056 for the next three years, and then the duty is reduced to $0.972. The amendment takes out of the present law the provision relating to the Dutch standard and the refiners' differential and reduces the duty on refined sugar from $1.90 per hundred to $1.27½ and reduces the duty on "Cuban 96" from $1.346 to $0.972.

From a careful study I am convinced that with the progress being made in the development of the beet-sugar industry and the cheapening of the processes of production the amounts suggested will be ample protection. It is not my purpose at this time to discuss at length the amendment or the tariff bill. When the bill comes from the committee to the Senate I will give my views upon its provisions at some length. Unless it is materially changed from its present form I can not give it my support.

I am very earnestly in favor of a revision of the tariff, but I am not in favor of free trade, and, as inconsistent and faulty as this measure is, that apparently is the purpose of its advocates.

I voted against the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill, and at that time gave my reasons for so doing. I have not changed my opinion of that measure and believe the criticisms I then made were fully justified. Since that time I have been endeavoring at every opportunity to get the law amended, but between the stand-pat protectionists on the one side, and the free traders on the other, we have been unable to accomplish that very desirable result.

This bill, in my opinion, is more indefensible from the standpoint of principle than is the Payne-Aldrich law. It has all of the iniquities of the Canadian reciprocity act which passed the last Congress and was rejected by Canada, and none of its few and doubtful merits. It is not drawn from the standpoint of protection because it will break down a number of legitimately protected industries; it is not a tariff for revenue only because it places sugar, wool, and other most important revenue-producing articles on the free list; and it is not consistent with the theory of free trade because it places a high protective duty on a number of products. It has the evils of every one of the tariff systems suggested and the virtues of none. The placing of wool on the free list and the retaining of a comfortable duty for the manufacturers of woolen goods is doubtless done upon the policy of free raw materials, yet at the same time this bill places a duty on the hair of the Angora goat, which is a raw material in exactly the same manner as is wool. Why the goat should be treated with more consideration than the sheep has not been explained, except that it is alleged that large numbers of these goats happen to live in a section of the country which is strongly represented on the Ways and Means Committee of the House.

It puts a protective duty on wheat and cattle, and at the same time places flour and meats on the free list. This is protection for raw materials and free trade for the finished products, exactly the reverse of the policy as to wool. This apparently is for the political purpose of telling the farmer that it protects his products, and also declaring to the laboring man in the industrial centers that the flour from which his loaf of bread is made and the meats served upon his table are no longer taxed. The politician who thinks that the farmer or laboring man is so ignorant as to be caught by such superficial pretense will find himself mistaken. It places a large number of steel products on the free list, and at the same time increases very largely the duty on ferromanganese, a necessary ingredient of steel, and the production of which in the United States is controlled absolutely by the Steel Trust. It thereby strengthens the grip of that great corporation upon the steel industry of our country. It places low duties on the high-priced cotton goods made in New England and high duties on the cheap cotton goods manufactured in the South.

These are only a few of the gross and indefensible provisions of this bill, and I trust that the Committee on Finance will see fit to take them out before they report it back to the Senate. The bill should be so written as to preserve the prosperity of American industries and at the same time take out of the present tariff law the provisions concerning which the American people have made such just complaint. Such a course is entirely practicable and consistent, and the best interests of our people demand that it be followed.

The committee owes it to the country to put the bill in such shape that it can merit the support of every genuine tariff reformer who believes that our industrial prosperity should be preserved, and that at the same time there should be removed from the law the evils that greed and selfishness have injected into our tariff system.

I thank the Senator from Colorado.

During the delivery of Mr. BRISTOW's speech,

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. REED. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] had the floor. The Senator from North Carolina appears to have yielded the floor to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS].

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is just the reverse.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Colorado then yields the floor to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW], who has permission of the Senate to introduce an amendment. With that amendment comes a statement, very interesting, but, I think, very much out of order. All of this proceeding is entirely out of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order would be well taken if the Senator from Missouri had the facts. The Senator from North Carolina did not yield the floor to the Senator from Colorado. The Chair recognized the Senator from Colorado in his own right.

Mr. REED. Begging the Chair's pardon, the record will show, in my judgment, that the Senator from North Carolina had the floor, that then the Senator from Colorado addressed the Chair, and the Senator from North Carolina said, "I yield to the Senator from Colorado." However that may be, Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas asked permission only to introduce an amendment, and he is now delivering an address. I insist on the point of order.

Mr. BRISTOW. I asked the Senator from Colorado to yield to me, which he very kindly did, and the Senator from Missouri can certainly have no complaint. The matter is between the Senator from Colorado and myself, and I shall soon be through with the statement which I suggested to the Senator from Colorado that I should like to make.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas will proceed.

After the conclusion of Mr. BRISTOW's speech he submitted the following amendment, which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. BRISTOW to the bill (H. R. 3321) to reduce tariff duties and to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes:

On page 48, strike out lines 1 to 20, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Testing by the polariscope not above 75 degrees, nine-tenths of 1 cent per pound, and for every additional degree shown by the polariscopic test twenty-five one-thousandths of 1 cent per pound additional, and fractions of a degree in proportion; from and after June 30, 1916, testing by the polariscope not above 75 degrees, nine-tenths of 1 cent per pound, and for every additional degree shown by the polariscopic test two one-hundredths of 1 cent per pound additional, and fractions of a degree in proportion; from and after June 30, 1919, testing by the polariscope not above 75 degrees, nine-tenths of 1 cent per pound, and for every additional degree shown by the polariscopic test fifteen one-thousandths of 1 cent per pound additional, and fractions of a degree in proportion; molasses testing not above 40 degrees, 20 per cent ad valorem; testing above 40 degrees and not above 56 degrees, 3 cents per gallon; testing above 56 degrees, 6 cents per gallon; sugar drainings and sugar sweepings shall be subject to duty as molasses or sugar, as the case may be, according to polariscopic test.

Maple sugar and maple sirup, 3 cents per pound; glucose or grape sugar, 1½ cents per pound; sugar cane in its natural state, or unmanufactured, 20 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. THOMAS. I had intended to-day, Mr. President, to say something upon some matters suggested by the distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] on last Friday. Inasmuch, however, as the Senate majority desire to proceed with perhaps what is more immediately important business, I shall content myself with carrying out that purpose in the near future. My object in asking the indulgence of the Senate at this time is to correct a statement which I made during the discussion on last Friday with reference to certain wage rates prevailing in the sugar-beet fields of the West.

Mr. President, you will perhaps recall that during that discussion in which I took some part, in an effort to convey some information of a personal character to the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], I stated, among other things, that the cost per acre of sugar-beet cultivation was about $20, and then made some reference to the character of labor which was employed under those contracts, taking occasion to say, among other things, that it was among the cheapest labor on this continent. The Senator from Michigan requested a statement as to the rate per day, which I was unwilling to make, but afterwards made in reply to his inquiry. That reply was incorrect; it was perhaps inexcusably so; but it resulted from a momentary confusion in my mind from a calculation which I had made some time ago of the monthly wage rate paid in the sugar-cane fields of Hawaii for labor there and found in a bulletin of the Bureau of Labor, which averaged twenty-three dollars and some cents per month. The confusion arose, first, in confounding that case with conditions in my own section of the country, and, next, in confounding the monthly rate with the daily rate.

This, perhaps, is an explanation which does not explain, but I have always believed, Mr. President, that when I make an error the best way is to acknowledge it and to state the reasons therefor, whatever they may have been.

At the time this table of statistics was called to my attention I was engaged in an effort to ascertain the daily wage paid to certain juvenile delinquents in my State, sent into the beet fields by the juvenile court of the city of Denver, and also the wage rate paid to some Indians, who at about the same time were similarly engaged. This confusion resulted in a statement which did injustice not only to my own State but to the neighboring States engaged in the same industry. The wage rate, in so far as adults are concerned, was stated pretty nearly correctly during the discussion by Senators on the other side of the Chamber. I wish the correction to appear, of course, in the RECORD.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado—I did not quite catch his closing remarks—whether he is prepared to state now what is the average wage paid in the beet fields of Colorado?

Mr. THOMAS. The average rate per acre is $20 for hand labor. The average rate paid to adults in that work ranges, according to my information, from $1.50 to something over $2 per day. With reference to the women and the children who are also engaged in the work, their wage rate must be very much below that.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. Just one moment. I intend in the further discussion of this matter to go into that somewhat more fully.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I have a large number of telegrams on my desk, that were received without any inspiration on my part, from almost every community in the State of Colorado where sugar beets are raised. These telegrams are particularly uniform in their statements; they come from reputable people, and I had very much hoped that there would be no conflict between the wage statement made in those telegrams and the statement of the Senator from Colorado. I do not care to have these telegrams read into the RECORD, because they are evidently prompted by the mistake which the Senator has himself acknowledged.

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. But there is scarcely a telegram in this entire lot—and I think they come from people whom the Senator will recognize as accurate—that does not insist that the wage paid in the beet fields of Colorado averages all the way from $2.50 to $3 per day.

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator will accept the suggestion, he very kindly showed me the telegrams a few moments ago, with the request that I look at them. I have not yet had an opportunity to do so, and I would suggest that between now and the next meeting of the Senate I will confer with the Senator with reference to his information, and perhaps we can agree. Is that satisfactory?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me before he takes his seat, it is just such inaccuracies as these and such lack of reliable information which prompted me to suggest that the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] was a most appropriate one. If there is such a vast difference of opinion as to the wage paid in any industry that is to be vitally affected under this bill, especially in the State represented by the Senator from Colorado, it seems to me that we ought to have here all the information we can get; and I hope, if we are to be confronted with a vote, that we may have the final and best judgment of the Senator from Colorado on the extent of the wage paid in the beet fields. However, if it suits his convenience better, I will be very glad to submit the telegrams to him and not encumber the public records with them, although they are most interesting and instructive and lead me to believe more fervently than I have ever believed in the wisdom of protecting the sugar industry of our country from ruinous foreign competition.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I did not suppose it was possible for anything to increase the intensity of the Senator's devotion to the wisdom of protection.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; the inaccuracy of the Senator from Colorado added very much to my intensity.

Mr. THOMAS. I am very glad to have been of some service to my distinguished friend from Michigan; but, if I understand the Senator correctly, he is willing to act on my suggestion.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I did not expect such inaccuracy from my honored friend, especially as he is a member of the Committee on Finance, one of the selected few who is supposed to have unusual qualifications for meeting public expectation on this bill.

Mr. THOMAS. I made a statement, Mr. President, which was not correct, and I have acknowledged it; but I do not, by taking that course, for a moment concede that I do not know a little something about this matter. All I ask is an opportunity to examine the telegrams.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Now, Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado is a very frank man——

Mr. THOMAS. Thank you.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And challenges my admiration——

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I rise again to a point of order.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I want to say to him——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri will state his point of order.

Mr. THOMAS. I hope the Senator from Missouri will not interrupt the Senator from Michigan when he is paying me these compliments merely to make a point of order.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, nearly all the debate this afternoon has been out of order. The Senator from Colorado is holding the floor, and he and the Senator from Michigan appear to be having a private debate between themselves—not in the nature of asking questions or asking for information, but a general debate.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. While that can be tolerated to a reasonable extent, it seems to me we have nearly reached the limit.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is the Senator from Missouri anxious to occupy the floor? If so, I yield gladly. I had no thought that I was obstructing the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. THOMAS. I think I have the floor. I have not yet yielded.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The floor is now in the possession of the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, let me finish with the Senator from Colorado. If it had not been for a mere accident—and it was an accident—that the discussion took place on Friday, we would not have known that a member of the Committee on Finance was actually in darkness on the question of the wage paid in an industry in his own State. Does not that argue strongly in favor of light and such public hearings as will impress Senators, at least, with the importance of accuracy in dealing with industries of this character?

Mr. THOMAS. Is that all?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes. I yield the floor back to the Senator. I may want to say something after he has read the telegrams, but I will not take advantage of him to do so now.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, in the discussion the other day I stated, and I stated correctly, the rate per acre for hand labor upon the beet fields. The division of that amount in the matter of wages is quite another proposition, and upon that I made a statement which was incorrect.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I rose for the purpose of correcting the RECORD to that extent, and saying that during the day I wanted to read these telegrams and discuss this matter at greater length, but in view of the wishes of the majority I will postpone that reading to a more appropriate occasion. I now yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BACON obtained the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just a minute?

Mr. BACON. Not exceeding a minute?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think it will exceed a minute. I simply want to make a correction. I think the Senator from Colorado will agree to the correction I desire to make.

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly, if the Senator from Georgia will yield.

Mr. BACON. Of course, Mr. President, I can not resist that.

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator promises to take but a minute——

Mr. SMOOT. I will not take over a minute. The Senator has repeated the statement——

Mr. REED. Mr. President, just for information, I should like to inquire who has the floor?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] has the floor.

Mr. THOMAS. I yielded to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMOOT. And he yielded to me for a minute.

Mr. BACON. I only yield for the purpose of a correction that the Senator wishes to make; not for a speech.

Mr. SMOOT. That is all I desire.

Mr. BACON. I will not yield the floor for the latter purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, it will only take me a minute. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] made the statement the other day that the cost of cultivating an acre of beets is $20.

Mr. THOMAS. I said with hand labor. I meant to say contract labor.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course that is a different proposition. I stated that in Utah it cost $35, and I believed it cost $35 in Colorado. I will agree with the Senator if he will say that simply the topping of the beet and the thinning of the beet in his own State is contracted for at $20; but those are only two of the items. The other expenses of cultivation of the beet will bring the cost up to $35, as I stated.

Mr. THOMAS. I will not concede by any means that the $20 per acre only includes those two items.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Georgia to yield to me to permit me to offer an amendment to the pending amendment, in order that it may be printed in the RECORD, so that Senators may have an opportunity to examine it before this question comes up again.

Mr. BACON. I will do so with pleasure.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. And I will ask the Senator to permit it to be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

I move to amend the pending motion to amend, offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania, by adding thereto the following:

And the Senate Committee on Finance is further instructed to submit to all manufacturers, who shall appear before said committee, or who shall file protests against any of the provisions of said bill, or briefs or arguments relating to any of its provisions, the following interrogatories, the same to be answered separately and specifically, the answer to each question to be numbered to correspond with the question propounded:

First. What is the nature and use of the commodity which you produce?

Second. What are the raw materials used in its production?

Third. What is the amount of the production of this commodity in this country?

Fourth. What is the amount of the consumption of this commodity in this country?

Fifth. How many concerns are engaged in the manufacture of the commodity under consideration?

Sixth. Who are the principal producers?

Seventh. What are the ruling market prices of this commodity in this country?

Eighth. What are the ruling market prices of this commodity in competing countries?

Ninth. What is the total cost of production per unit of product in this country?

Tenth. What is the total cost of production per unit of product in competing countries?

Eleventh. What is the percentage of the labor cost to the total cost of a unit of product in this country?

Twelfth. What is the percentage of the labor cost to the total cost of a unit of product in competing foreign countries?

Thirteenth. What is the cost of transportation to the principal markets in this country from the principal point of production in this country?

Fourteenth. What is the cost of transportation to the principal markets in this country from the principal points of production in competing foreign countries?

Fifteenth. What part of the existing duty represents the difference in the cost of production between this and competing foreign countries?

Sixteenth. What part of the existing duty represents the profit of the American manufacturer?

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, just one word.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] has the floor.

Mr. PENROSE. If the Senator will yield to me for just two words, as far as I am personally concerned I am entirely in favor of that amendment, although I have never heard it read before, and I will accept it and do what I can to secure its adoption.

Mr. JAMES. Just a moment, Mr. President. I desire to ask the Senator a question. Would he accept the amendment if it were amended so as to provide that these questions should be answered under oath?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes; certainly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I thought of so stating it myself; and I shall be very glad to accept that amendment.

Mr. PENROSE. In fact, it was always customary in the days of Republican majorities to administer the oath to all witnesses. The oath proposition was only discovered by the Democracy after the House hearings were about half over.

Mr. JAMES. The Senator is entirely mistaken about that.

Mr. PENROSE. The record will show it.

Mr. JAMES. The record will not show it, but, to the contrary, will show that on the very second day of the hearings I myself made the motion that the witnesses should be sworn.

Mr. PENROSE. Then I am mistaken about their being half over. I will modify the statement and say that the proceedings were started before the necessity of administering an oath was discovered by any of the majority.

Mr. JAMES. That is quite a different statement. We had hearings for six weeks; and there is quite a difference between the statement that the hearings were half over and the statement—which is the fact—that this was done on the second day.

Mr. PENROSE. Four years ago a resolution was passed requiring the oath before the proceedings were begun; but, of course, our friends will learn as the proceedings advance.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask leave to insert at the right place in my amendment the words "shall answer under oath." I desire to make that addition to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so understood. The amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, as modified, will lie on the table and be printed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Georgia that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt.

Mr. KERN. I ask for a division.

Mr. PENROSE. I call for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. JACKSON]. As he is absent, I will withhold my vote.

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. POMERENE (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. ASHURST (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Arizona was called). My colleague [Mr. SMITH] is necessarily absent from the Senate on important business. During his absence he is paired with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL.]

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CATRON. My colleague [Mr. FALL] is necessarily absent. As announced by the Senator from Arizona, he is paired with the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. GALLINGER. I am directed to announced that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] is paired with the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] is paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. POMERENE. I transfer my pair to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and will vote. I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 48, nays 34, as follows:

The Secretary read the cablegram, as follows:

[Cablegram.]

TAIYUANFUS, CHINA, May 10, 1913.

To the President, Senate, and Representatives of the American Republic, Washington:

The people of Shansi Province, China, send greetings. The Republic of China is now properly established, and news of your esteemed Government's recognition has been received with the utmost pleasure and gratitude. The day before yesterday, the 8th May, the Chinese people everywhere assembled to celebrate and offer thanks for your Government's recognition. The people of Shansi were no exception, and assembled to celebrate in tens of thousands in grateful celebration of this auspicious occasion. The presence of an American citizen enhanced the ceremony, and together we joined in giving cheers for the Republics of America and China, respectively. The Chinese people also unitedly expressed the fervent hope that the American and Chinese Republics may be of mutual assistance in the furtherance of universal peace.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—PROPOSED TARIFF HEARINGS.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas will state it.

Mr. SHEPPARD. It was stated in the New York World, and perhaps other metropolitan newspapers, a few days ago, that several Democratic Senators, including myself, intend to vote against the Democratic side on the question of public hearings on the tariff bill.

I wish to state that so far as I am concerned the report is utterly incorrect and absolutely without any foundation.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair was about to announce that while of opinion that the undisposed-of message from the House of Representatives with reference to the tariff bill is regularly before the Senate, still, if there be no objection, the Chair will call for petitions and memorials.

Mr. PENROSE. I have no objection to that.

Mr. LODGE. It seems to me there would be no harm in that course. It will take a very short time to get rid of the routine morning business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair had the feeling that certain Senators would desire to present petitions and memorials, and if there be no objection the Chair will pursue that course and call for petitions and memorials. He recognizes the Senator from Massachusetts for that purpose.

Mr. LODGE. I present certain resolutions of the Legislature of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, which I ask may be read, and the accompanying paper referred to in the resolutions I ask may be printed in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the resolutions of the Legislature of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts were read and the paper accompanying them ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolutions relative to the tariff.

THE COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS, 1913.

Whereas on April 3, 1913, His Excellency Eugene N. Foss, governor of Massachusetts, recommended in a message of that date that the legislature address the Congress of the United States with reference to the tariff legislation now pending: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That, in conformity with this recommendation, the Legislature of Massachusetts respectfully submits to the Congress of the United States the following considerations in regard to tariff legislation:

With many of the arguments and conclusions presented by his excellency the governor in his message hereto appended, the legislature is not in accord, but is in full agreement with him as to the importance of the subject, representing as do the members of the legislature a State conspicuous both for the extent and the variety of its industries, many of which are gravely affected by the tariff laws of the United States; be it further

Resolved, That at the outset the legislature respectfully calls attention to the following statement in the message of his excellency the governor:

"The concrete political expression of the popular demand appears in the election of a Democratic President and a Democratic Congress; but the two platforms which indorsed the principle of protection received, in the votes of the candidates who stood upon them, a greater indorsement by the American people at the last election than the platform which repudiated the principle of a protective tariff."

Resolved, That the legislature believes that there is no doubt that a large majority of the voters of the United States cast their votes in favor of maintaining the protective principle in tariff legislation, and that the voters of the United States have given no mandate to Congress in favor of tariff legislation based on free-trade principles.

Resolved, That the policy of opening the markets of the United States to the unrestricted competition of the rest of the world, advocated by the President in his message, and the pending bill, which is a long step toward the complete establishment of that policy, appear to the legislature to be in direct contravention of the wishes of the voters of the United States, and especially of this Commonwealth, as expressed in the last election.

Resolved, That the legislature therefore respectfully urges that any tariff legislation undertaken by Congress be based upon the protective principle, and that the legislature is of opinion that there should be a reasonable protection accorded to all industries, sufficient to maintain American wages and American standards of living and to prevent the necessity of reductions, either in the rates of wages or in the total amount of the wage fund paid out. Be it further

Resolved, That a tariff commission of disinterested experts, such as we have had in the past, should be reestablished in order that tariff changes may be made scientifically, and not be the work of partisan committees irregularly modified by local and sectional interests.

Resolved, That the legislature believes that the maximum and minimum provisions should be continued, because in this way alone can we secure equal treatment in the markets of the world and protect ourselves against unjust discriminations.

Resolved, That the legislature is of opinion that the raw materials of any industry which never have been and can not be produced in the United States, should be admitted free of duty; that the legislature especially urges upon Congress the importance of maintaining a proportionate difference in rates between raw materials which bear a duty and the finished product into which such raw materials are converted; and that to reduce the duty on the finished product and at the same time to increase or to leave untouched the existing duty upon the raw material of such product, as is done in many instances in the proposed bill, is not free trade or open competition but a wanton destruction of the industries so treated.

Whereas the pending bill authorizes the President to enter into reciprocal trade arrangements with other countries, a power he already possesses without action on the part of Congress:

Resolved, That the legislature is opposed to any so-called reciprocity which does not bring to the United States advantages which correspond with the concessions made; and that the legislature does not believe in reciprocity which purchases advantages for any industry or section at the expense of other industries or other sections of our common country, but that real reciprocity requires that where duties are removed, as this bill proposes, on certain articles of general consumption, the removal should be made dependent on our securing like concessions from the countries whence these articles are to be imported.

Resolved, That, believing that the principles which have been set forth above are the true principles to be followed in any tariff revision, and that only by adherence to them will the prosperity and business welfare of the country be promoted, the legislature respectfully submits them to the Congress of the United States for its consideration.

Resolved, That the legislature respectfully urges upon the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress to give reasonable opportunity to persons and corporations engaged in industries which will be affected by the proposed tariff legislation to be heard before final action is taken by the Congress of the United States.

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be sent by the secretary of the Commonwealth to the presiding officers of both branches of the Congress of the United States and to each Senator and Representative from Massachusetts in Congress.

In senate, adopted April 25, 1913.

In house of representatives, adopted, in concurrence, May 5, 1913.

A true copy.

Attest:

FRANK J. DONAHUE,
Secretary of the Commonwealth.

(House, No. 2269.)

THE COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS,
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Boston, April 3, 1913.

To the honorable senate and house of representatives:

I deem it my duty to call your attention to a course of events which is of great importance to the people of the Commonwealth and to urge your cooperation in bringing about the public action which the situation demands.

THE RECENT POLITICAL REVOLUTION ORIGINATED IN MASSACHUSETTS.

Three years ago there was inaugurated in this Commonwealth a political revolution which spread rapidly throughout the Nation and was consummated the 4th day of March in a complete change of the National Government. Each step in this movement was decisive, and the impelling motives and forces behind it were irresistible.

The first manifestation of the change in popular opinion was the election on the 22d day of March, 1910, in the fourteenth Massachusetts congressional district. In this great manufacturing center a traditional Republican majority of 15,000 was turned into a Democratic majority of 6,000, an overturn of 21,000 in a total vote of 24,500. In the State election in 1910 the Democratic candidate for governor turned the Taft majority of 110,000 into a Democratic majority of 36,000, a change of 146,000 in a total vote of a little over 400,000. In the State election of 1911, the only State election held in a pivotal Northern State, the Democratic candidate for governor overcame the massed forces of the whole national Republican Party. In these three elections this candidate was the only Democrat elected. In the national election of 1912 the same Democratic candidate received a plurality of almost 50,000, was elected for the third time a Democratic governor of Republican Massachusetts, and led the national ticket by 30,000 votes.

A NONPARTISAN STRUGGLE FOR AN ECONOMIC PRINCIPLE.

The reason for these four successes was that the candidate who attained them individualized the precise issue upon which the revolution turned.

The conditions which caused this movement still exist. No statute has been passed in response to it and, so far as the public is informed, none has been framed. But legislators elected with a mandate to make such response are about to meet. It is the highest interest of the American people that the meaning of this revolution be not misconceived, that its purposes be not thwarted, and that its objects be promptly and definitely realized in law.

The movement originated in Massachusetts. The people of this Commonwealth were the first, as they have so often been, to sense the dangers confronting them and the whole country. These dangers were more apparent to those who had the needs of Massachusetts in mind, but the quick recognition by the rest of the country of the justice of the revolt of Massachusetts against existing conditions showed that the arguments of the leaders in the movement applied with almost equal force to the entire country.

The movement was in no sense political. The apparent reversal of political opinion in Massachusetts is shown by analysis to amount to a nonpartisan demand for a specific economic policy, which heretofore no political party has espoused. This Massachusetts doctrine appealed to the entire country. The Legislature of Massachusetts may with propriety and, having in mind its duty to the people, it should appeal to the Congress of the United States to apply to existing economic conditions the economic policy which the people have so emphatically demanded and indorsed.

THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY SHOULD APPLY THIS PRINCIPLE.

The concrete political expression of the popular demand appears in the election of a Democratic President and a Democratic Congress; but the two platforms which indorsed the principle of protection received, in the votes of the candidates who stood upon them, a greater indorsement by the American people at the last election than the platform which repudiated the principle of a protective tariff.

A DEMAND FOR THE MASSACHUSETTS PRINCIPLE OF TARIFF REDUCTION.

The popular movement is a nonpartisan demand for a revision of the tariff. It is to be expected that the President will outline a policy in his forthcoming message to Congress. Up to the present the only indication of the Democratic attitude is to be found in the bills prepared by the last special session. These measures were not satisfactory from the point of view of those who desire to see the tariff question settled upon the broadest basis of public interest. It is to be hoped that the President's message will outline a policy that will lead to such a settlement. He has invited the cooperation of all in his work. It seems fitting that we in Massachusetts, who have so much at stake in the proper settlement of the tariff question and who have had so important a part in the struggle which led to his election, should contribute an expression of what we have contended for as the true method of tariff adjustment.

The policy demanded by the American people during the past three years was a reduction of the tariff for the benefit of all the people. No considerable part of the voters were willing to support the doctrine of free trade advocated in the Democratic platform or the policy of deliberative and postponed reduction promised by the two wings of the Republican Party. But the great body of the people, without reference to political allegiance, desired the immediate adoption of a policy of tariff reduction which should benefit American industry and American trade, advance American production of every kind, and relieve the people from unjust tariff burdens. It was a nonpartisan demand for economic reform. It was a demand for the policy which constituted the appeal for the revolution at its first beginnings in Massachusetts—the Massachusetts policy of constructive tariff reduction.

The Massachusetts plan of constructive tariff reduction was formulated in 1902 by the candidate who appealed to the people upon it four times with such marked success. He was then a Republican candidate for Congress in open revolt against the tariff policy of his party. His unremitting agitation, continued for eight years, had brought him into the Democratic Party. He secured the adoption by that party in Massachusetts of the tariff policy which he had advocated, made that policy the slogan upon which four Democratic victories, the first for many years, were won, and showed it thus to be the motive of the political revolution just consummated. Carrying the burden of the national battle unaided in the State election of 1911, he formulated the issue concisely against the Republican Party and established by his victory the basis of Democratic success. The issue was stated in the Massachusetts platform of 1911:

"The Payne-Aldrich law should at once be revised by eliminating the protection which promotes monopoly, produces private profit instead of public revenue, and obstructs free domestic competition and the sale of American products in foreign markets.

"We declare for removal of all duties on foodstuffs which enter into general popular consumption and on the raw materials of our manufactures.

"We favor a broad program of reciprocal trade agreements with other nations, that our commerce may be developed and new markets opened to the products of American industry."

THE TRUE PRINCIPLE LIKELY TO BE MISCONCEIVED.

The Democratic candidate for governor had summed this platform up during his 10 years' conflict inside the Republican Party and outside in these words: "Elimination of superfluous protection, free raw materials, no free trade, but reciprocity and fair trade." Nothing could be clearer than the indorsement of that policy by the American people. But almost equally clear is the danger that precisely the reverse of this platform in each of its three parts will be put into effect in tariff legislation by the special session of Congress about to meet.

In all tariff legislation three purposes must be kept in mind—the raising of revenue for the Government, the encouragement of domestic production, and the maintenance of the conditions necessary for private profit to domestic producers. No one of these purposes should be favored to the exclusion of the others. The combined consideration of the three purposes tends to the advancement of each. Yet the record of tariff legislation and of proposals for tariff legislation offers nothing but illustration of misconception of these principles.

THE REPUBLICAN GUARANTEE AND THE DEMOCRATIC DISREGARD OF PROFIT BOTH BAD.

Both parties offend in this respect. The Democratic Party asserts its principle of tariff revision so broadly that the defeat of its purposes may be forecasted in advance. The Republican Party, in its national platform of 1908, set up a principle of tariff making so erroneous that to overturn it was the purpose of the recent political revolution. To meet this principle squarely is the duty of the Democratic Congress. The Republican platform declared for "such duties as will equalize the cost of production at home and abroad together with a reasonable profit to American industries." Such a tariff attempts to guarantee profits for some. The obvious result is to make it difficult for producers generally to earn them, to curtail production, to discourage importation, and to restrict the raising of revenue by tariff taxation. "The Democratic policy," announced by one of the leaders March 10, 1912, "clearly excludes the idea of protecting manufacturers' profits." This policy is more pernicious than that of the Republican Party. It excludes not only the idea of guaranteeing profits, but all consideration of the conditions under which manufacturers may earn them. It not only defeats the purposes of encouraging domestic production and assuring private profit to domestic producers, but also, through the curtailment of importations of the materials of manufacture, defeats the very purpose itself of raising revenue.

PROTECTIVE REDUCTION THE TRUE PRINCIPLE.

A tariff for revenue would seem to require increases of duties as well as decreases, and the Democratic House of Representatives proposed certain increases for revenue purposes at the last session. But an increase in the rate of a duty may defeat the purpose of protection and the purpose of revenue at the same time. If the increase is in the duty on raw materials of manufacture, the industry may be wiped out and both the profits and the public revenue terminated. Decreases in duties on raw materials may result, by reason of the effect in increasing the actual protection upon the manufactured product, in unjust enrichment at the expense of the public revenue. The duties on sugar, for example, are the principal source of tariff revenue, yet these duties are, by reason of the application of the principle of compensation, also a chief source of unjust private enrichment from the tariff at the expense both of the revenue and of all the people. The failure to consider the protective effect of a rate is to throw overboard the chart and compass of tariff making and to drift upon the sea of fallacy, log rolling, private tariff privilege, and corruption. If the compass is retained and read aright, it will point steadily to the polestar of tariff reduction. To increase duties is never necessary for revenue purposes. That object may always be attained by well-directed reductions when some duty remains after the superfluous part has been eliminated. The determination of such a duty should be the object of all tariff making, and such a duty should be the main source of tariff revenue. It provides an automatic balance between the producers and the people, and applies a constant stimulus to American manufacturers not to be content with the home market, but to compete with the foreigner in foreign markets. It is true that the determination of the exact rate of duty is not easy, but it is not less evident that the true course which leads to that determination is clear. It lies not in the path of decreases and increases that hurt American industry, but in decreases which help.

REDUCTION AND PROTECTION NOT INCONSISTENT.

Our recent tariff history is full of illustrations of decreases in duties which help American producers. An emphatic demand for resolute tariff reduction is in no way hostile to American industry. A downward revision of the tariff has been going on for 40 years. It is untrue to say that American industry has been held in check by protective duties. The truth is that these duties have resulted in the phenomenal growth of American industry during that period. The evil lies in the failure to continue the process of reduction, to apply it generally, to reduce decisively, and to establish as a rule of law the proper method of such reduction.

This method is indicated by experience in its application. In steel rails, for instance, the tariff was originally made in 1867 at 45 per cent ad valorem, when American railroads were paying British manufacturers $145 to $166 per ton. In 1871 the tariff was reduced to $28 per ton, then to $25.20, and finally advanced, in 1875, to $28 again. This was in force until 1883, when a reduction to $17 was made. In 1890 another reduction was made to $13.44, and under this duty the country produced over 15,000,000 tons in a year, and the price of rails fell here below that in England. In 1894 the duty was reduced to $7.84 per ton, and in 1909 to $3.92. At the end of this period of progressive protective reduction there had been established a great industry in this country, and American railroads were able to buy domestic rails below the British price and at a lower price than iron rails had ever been purchased for in either country.

On pig iron during the Civil War the duty was $9 per ton. In 1870 it was reduced to $7 per ton, and in 1873 to $6.30. In 1883 it was $6.72 per ton, and this was the rate until the Democrats revised it downward in 1894 under the Willson bill to $4. In 1909 the rate was reduced by a Republican Congress to $2.50.

In the Payne-Aldrich tariff the rate on iron ore was reduced from 40 cents a ton to 15 cents a ton, and the rate on iron in pigs, wrought and cast, was reduced from $4 a ton to $1 a ton, yet the value of exports of iron and steel manufactures—the rate being unchanged upon the finished product—increased from $144,951,357 in 1909 to $179,133,186 in 1910 and to $230,725,252 in 1911.

In the Payne-Aldrich tariff the tax of 15 per cent was taken off hides, and they were admitted free. The rate on boots and shoes was reduced from 25 per cent to 10 per cent, the rate on saddlery was reduced from 35 per cent to 20 per cent, and the rates on other manufactures of leather were much reduced. Yet under the reduced rates the value of our exports of leather manufactures increased from $42,974,795 in 1909 to $52,646,755 in 1910 and $53,673,056 in 1911.

The rate on agricultural implements was reduced from 20 per cent to 15 per cent, yet the value of exports of agricultural implements increased from $25,694,184 in 1909 to $28,124,033 in 1910 and to $35,973,398 in 1911.

THE SILK INDUSTRY BUILT UP ON FREE RAW MATERIALS.

The most striking proof, however, of our ability to manufacture in competition with the rest of the world is afforded by the history of the silk industry in the United States. The raw material of silk manufactures, unlike the raw material of manufactures of cotton and of wool, is not produced in the United States. Nor were the manufactures of silk regarded as necessaries of life, as manufactures of cotton and of wool undoubtedly are, and silk goods were considered peculiarly a European product.

MARVELOUS GROWTH FROM SMALL BEGINNINGS.

In 1869 there were only 139 silk establishments in the United States, with a total capital of $2,926,980 and a value of products of only $6,607,771. In 1870 our output of silk was worth $12,000,000; in 1880 it was forty-one millions. In 1883 the duty on raw silk was abolished. In 1890 our output of manufactured silk was worth eighty-seven millions; in 1900—panic and protracted hard times having intervened—it was worth one hundred and seven millions, and in 1910 it was worth one hundred and ninety-six millions. In the decade between 1900 and 1910 manufactures of silk in the United States increased more than 87 per cent, or about four times as fast as population.

COMMAND OF THE RAW SILK SUPPLY LED TO CONTROL OF THE DOMESTIC MARKET.

While in the year 1868–69 the importations of raw materials of silk manufactures into the United States aggregated only 726,695 pounds, with an invoice value of $3,312,726, the importations for the year 1909–10 were 20,863,377 pounds, or twenty-eight times the weight of 41 years before, and of the invoice value of $65,424,784, or about twenty times that of the earlier period. The American consumption of raw silk is now far in excess of that of any other country, and imports have advanced in the last 10 years by over 83 per cent, while the increase in imports of manufactured silk goods was only 17 per cent.

WE MANUFACTURE MORE SILK AND AT LESS COST THAN ANY OTHER CIVILIZED NATION.

In the decade between 1899 and 1909 American manufactures of silk dress goods, the foreigner's specialty, doubled both in quantity and in value, and, with free raw silk, despite the duties on other raw materials of silk manufacture and the general protective cost level, silk was manufactured in the United States at a less cost than in Europe. I believe that the same would be true of every other product of American industry under like conditions.

THE DEMOCRATIC THREAT OF DESTRUCTIVE UPWARD REVISION.

But this situation does not suit the Democratic Party. Their first desire is to apply at any cost the theory of a "tariff for revenue only." The thing which made possible the phenomenal growth of the silk industry was the removal of the duty long imposed on imports of raw silk. To grow silk in this country has been found impossible. The duty had cut off revenue, the growth of the industry, wages, and the creation of a supply within the reach of the people of an article of great use. The practice of taking off the duty on raw materials wherever proper has been responsible since the Civil War for the guaranty to the silk industry of the advantage upon which its growth depended. The Democratic majority of the House of Representatives, however, in the recent session proposed to take up the revision of the silk schedule, and the leaders announced that a 25 per cent duty on raw silk was to be imposed. The annihilation of the $200,000,000 silk industry that would surely follow this antiprotection, "for-revenue-only" revision upward provision would be a high price for the American people to pay for an experiment in tariff making.

The average citizen would prefer the protective rates of the McKinley tariff, which transferred the tinplate industry to the United States and in a few years made us large exporters to the so-called reductions which annihilate domestic industries and place the United States at the mercy of the foreign producer for its supply.

It will be conceded that a slow reduction of the tariff which reduces and stays reduced is better than a quick reduction which does not reduce at all. Reduction that benefits the country and sticks is based upon the same theory of the general welfare as protection. The two go naturally together.

The systematic policy of tariff reduction was continued in the Payne-Aldrich tariff law.

On the basis of actual imports of merchandise during the 34 months that law had been in operation down to May 31, 1912, it appears that the amount of goods imported without paying duty was a considerably larger percentage of the total of importations than under the Wilson law or the Dingley law, and that the average amount of duties paid per dollar, both of dutiable imports and of all imports, was very considerably lower.

THE TRUE POLICY IS TARIFF FOR PUBLIC REVENUE.

The Payne-Aldrich law produces ample revenue for the Government, with a larger free list than the Wilson law, which did not produce sufficient revenue, and with lower ad valorem rates both as to dutiable goods and as to all imports.

Under the Dingley law the average per cent of the imports that came in free was 44.3 per cent in value of the total importations. The average per cent in value of the imports which have come in free under the Payne law is 51.2 per cent of the total importations. The reduction in duties from the Dingley law to the Payne law was 10 per cent, and, considering reductions on all imports, it amounted to 21 per cent.

THE MAXIMUM AND MINIMUM PLAN TO REDUCE THE TARIFF FOR AMERICAN ADVANTAGE.

The Payne-Aldrich law contained provisions for the imposition of minimum rates instead of maximum in the discretion of the President in return for equivalent consideration from other countries.

ENCOURAGEMENT TO AMERICAN INDUSTRY BY REDUCTION.

Whatever reasons may have existed for high protection in the past none of them is valid to-day; the very considerations that brought about the imposition of high rates now operate in favor of reductions. The mistake of the Republicans consisted in their failure to apply correct principles consistently and for the public benefit. The Democrats will perpetrate a worse error if they abandon these principles.

In recent years the Republicans have taken "encouragement to domestic production" to refer merely to the establishment of a greater aggregate price value for American products and not to the creation of more real wealth and welfare for the country. The denial to industry, for example, of free access to raw materials, and, to workers, of free access to necessaries of life, subtracts just so much from the working capital of the country, diminishes the annual product by a much greater amount, and acts not only as a discouragement to production but as an actual blight.

Even the farmer, who relies largely upon natural forces for his product and is subjected to the competition of the world market, and is thus actually concerned very little about the tariff on what he raises, pays much more in duties on the things he uses than could possibly be figured as his benefit from protection, and this benefit, besides, he does not get. He, too, is discouraged. The discouragement arises from the artificial increase in the cost of production caused by the misapplication of the protective principle. With the demand in the home market for all the food products of the country the farmer is relieved of his concern for protection to his product.

When we compare, therefore, the cost of production at home with the cost of production abroad, for the purpose of ascertaining what rates will equalize the cost, we should figure the cost at home as what it would be if domestic producers had free access to raw materials for their industries and untaxed necessaries of life for their workers. And this will not work unfavorably upon the domestic producers, if any, of the raw materials. With the cost of production at home lessened in this way there would be a decrease in the necessary compensation in the tariff rate and a diminished burden to be distributed among the different classes of producers, including domestic purveyors of raw materials and necessaries of life.

A tariff framed upon this basis would not create a constant necessity of increased protection, but would open the door to all those influences which make for lower cost of production, such, for example, as increased consumption, wider and steadier markets, enlarged scale of production, and capacity use of men and machinery, and would tend to make protection unnecessary.

"Encouragement to domestic production," therefore, in the same way as a "tariff for revenue only," must be looked upon, under conditions existing at the end of a 60-year test of high-tariff rates, as an object to be attained only by the elimination of superfluous protection and a constant reduction of the tariff. With raw materials free and necessaries of life untaxed, there can be no question that the United States can produce manufactured articles which now enjoy protection at as low a cost as any other nation and protection will be to a greater extent superfluous and subject to be eliminated without damage to American industry.

NO REDUCTION WITHOUT A QUID PRO QUO.

But it does not necessarily follow that because protection is superfluous it should be eliminated. As the imposition of duties can be justified only on the ground of benefit to American industry, so is such benefit the only justification for the removal of a duty. A tariff tax is the price of admission to a market. In many cases the foreigner pays the price. If this condition exists without harm to American industry or the public welfare, it should not be disturbed except for a benefit to American industry and the American people. A market of 100,000,000 of the greatest consumers on earth is a possession of tremendous value. It is a possession of the American people. Every duty removed is a door opened to foreigners to enter upon this market. Every duty removed by the Democratic Congress without benefit or consideration to the American people will be a free gift to our foreign competitors of a valuable thing belonging to the American people.

NEITHER RETALIATION NOR FREE TRADE, BUT FAIR TRADE.

The day for duties merely for protection to American industry has almost passed. But the time for free trade has not come. The régime of high protection established the policy of international retaliation, but it merely postponed and made more desirable the day of fair trade. The policy of free trade would make impossible the establishment of fair trade and would not only throw away, but would, in addition, forever rob of its highest use the country's most valuable possession—its market of 100,000,000 consumers.

RECIPROCITY THE TRUE BASIS OF TARIFF LEGISLATION.

The advocates of free trade usually pride themselves upon being supporters of international peace and of economic stability and social justice. As a matter of fact, they are the victims of an illusion. The greatest possible harm to international peace would result from an American policy of free trade. We should, it is true, be ready to open up our markets to foreign producers whenever it can be done without injury to our own people and we should at all times aim at the greatest volume of international trade which can be carried on with the greatest profit to the United States. But if it is true that we can not sell unless we buy, so it is true that we can not buy unless others buy from us. If we have the greatest market on earth, it is equally true that our greatest need is foreign markets. While formerly our exports were made up largely of food products, these have been relegated to a subordinate rank, and, according to present tendencies, before an interval of many years, we will be importers rather than exporters. The stimulation of manufactures has become necessary by reason of our decreased ability to export food owing to the demand for nearly all the product in the home market, and without a market such stimulation would be useless. If we are to continue to meet our foreign obligations, pay for foodstuffs and raw materials imported, and avoid actual national bankruptcy, an expanded market for American manufactures is absolutely imperative. In the year 1898, for the first time, we sent abroad a larger value of articles from our factories than we imported, and the value of manufactured articles, partly or entirely completed, reached a total of 45.07 per cent of our total exports in the year 1911, while exports of all classes of foodstuffs had fallen to 19.13 per cent. While our food exports attained a maximum volume in 1898, they had reached their maximum proportion of the total of productions in 1880.

Our need of foreign markets for our manufactures is so great that to give away any share of our market without a quid pro quo in return to the people of the United States would be little short of treasonable. The true policy of tariff reduction should have for its primary purposes to open to American manufactures the markets of the world. In other words, and in the last analysis, the beginning and ending of all tariff legislation in the United States should be the policy of commercial reciprocity.

SCIENTIFIC REVISION, A TARIFF COMMISSION, AND RECIPROCITY.

For the steady administration of any tariff, a permanent board of nonpolitical experts, working in cooperation with our Diplomatic Service, our Consular Service, and the Treasury Department, can be of great usefulness to the country. The object of all scientific tariff-making is to adjust rates to changing conditions in the markets of the world. The true proposal for a tariff commission and for a scientific tariff is for the application of the policy of general reciprocity.

RECIPROCITY IS INTERNATIONAL COOPERATION.

Commercial reciprocity is an exchange of markets, a mutual gift of trade opportunities, the conferring of reciprocal privileges as regards customs or charges on imports and in other respects, the removal, by means of mutual agreements, of provisions for the protection of the domestic markets of two countries which constitute obstacles to trade between them; it is neither free trade nor commercial retaliation, but fair trade through a complement, correction, and counterbalance of the policy of protection, evidenced not by a surtax on goods coming from countries which discriminate against one another, but by the substitution of minimum for maximum rates between countries which favor one another; it is a means of taking the tariff out of politics, a permanent basis for the automatic adjustment of trade relations to commercial and industrial needs, and for scientific tariff making upon that basis, a remedy for commercial depression caused by tariff changes, a shock-absorber on the road of tariff legislation, a stimulus to domestic production through the creation of markets for domestic products, a provision for the mutual exchange of commodities essential to the continued growth of export trade, for the taking from customer nations of such products as may be used without harm to domestic producers, in order that they may take the excess of domestic production above domestic consumption; it is the recognition and turning to use not only of domestic industrial and economic strength, but that of other nations as well, the contemplation of the need the nations have for one another's resources, the substitution of commercial friendship and cooperation for the suspicion, distrust, and the industrial, political, and military reprisals which lead up to, constitute, and follow commercial war, and the broadest possible foundation of mutual self-interest between the nations for the superstructure of international peace.

RECIPROCITY THE BASIS OF NATIONAL WELFARE.

Reciprocity, in short, gets markets. The one thing without which industry can not go on is the market. The one great requisite without which American prosperity can not continue is the market for the products of American industry. We have built up through the artificial stimulus of protection the most wonderful productive forces ever combined in one nation. But this structure can escape ruin only with the aid of the natural stimulus of commercial reciprocity. Although our most inspired statesmen have urged this policy as just the one thing necessary for our economic welfare, it is just the thing successive administrations have failed to apply. Jefferson, Blaine, and McKinley, patron saints of two great opposing parties and advocates of two conflicting theories of tariff taxation, are the leaders among the many great American statesmen, who, though diametrically opposed to one another on almost every other economic policy, are agreed in their insistence upon the absolute necessity to the welfare of the United States of the policy of international reciprocity.

JEFFERSON THE FATHER OF RECIPROCITY.

During the first administration of Washington, in 1791, Congress desired to do something for the development of the commerce and navigation of the United States, but felt itself lacking the necessary information on the subject. The House of Representatives passed a resolution requesting the Secretary of State to report to Congress on the nature and extent of the privileges and restrictions of the commercial intercourse of the United States with foreign nations, and the measures which he should think proper to be adopted, for the improvement of the commerce and navigation of the same.

Mr. Jefferson's report, submitted after two years of inquiry into the facts, presents the conditions of our infant commerce of that day. Small as it was, the foreign restrictions upon the trade and upon our vessels engaged in it were extremely various and vexatious, especially in all that related to commerce with the colonies of European powers. After reciting them he asks the question, "In what way may they best be removed, modified, or counteracted?" He answers the question as follows:

"As to commerce, two methods occur: First, by friendly arrangements with the several nations with whom these restrictions exist; or, second, by the separate act of our own legislature for countervailing their efforts. There can be no doubt but that of these two friendly arrangement is the most eligible.

"Some nations, not yet ripe for free commerce in all its extent, might still be willing to modify their restrictions and regulations for us in proportion to the advantages which an intercourse with us might offer. Particularly, they may concur with us in reciprocating the duties to be levied on each side or in compensating any excess of duty by equivalent advantages of another nature."

Here was foreshadowed exactly the reciprocity of to-day. He proceeds as follows:

"But should any nation, contrary to our wishes, suppose it may better find its advantage by continuing its system of prohibitions, duties, and regulations, it behooves us to protect our citizens, their commerce, and navigation by counter prohibitions, duties, and regulations also. Free commerce and navigation are not to be given in exchange for restrictions and vexations, nor are they likely to produce a relaxation of them."

He prefaces his recommendations with this expression:

"The following principles, being founded in reciprocity, appear perfectly just and to offer no cause of complaint to any nation."

He admits the inconvenience of a system of discriminating duties, but supports it as necessary to avoid greater evils, and comes to the following conclusion:

"Still, it must be repeated that friendly arrangements are preferable with all who will come into them, and that we should carry into such arrangements all the liberality and spirit of accommodation which the nature of the case will admit."

Here is absolute proof that Thomas Jefferson at that early date advocated reciprocity and recommended it as a ruling principle.

BLAINE THE PROPHET OF RECIPROCITY.

The great Republican statesman, James G. Blaine, summed up his advocacy of this policy in the pithy phrase, "Reciprocity is the highest form of protection."

M'KINLEY, PROTECTION'S HIGH PRIEST, BASED PROTECTION ON RECIPROCITY.

What will go down in history as McKinley's farewell address contained these paragraphs:

"Only a broad and enlightened policy will keep what we have. No other policy will get more. In these times of marvelous business energy and gain we ought to be looking to the future, strengthening the weak places in our industrial and commercial systems, so that we may be ready for any storm or strain.

"By sensible trade arrangements which will not interrupt our home production we shall extend the outlets for our increasing surplus. A system which provides a mutual exchange of commodities is manifestly essential to the continued healthful growth of our export trade. We must not repose in fancied security that we can forever sell everything and buy little or nothing. If such a thing were possible, it would not be best for us or for those with whom we deal. We should take from our customers such of their products as we can use without harm to our industries and labor.

"Reciprocity is the natural outgrowth of our wonderful industrial development under the domestic policy now firmly established. What we produce beyond our domestic consumption must have a vent abroad. The excess must be relieved through a foreign outlet, and we should sell everything we can and buy wherever the buying will enlarge our sales and productions, and thereby make a greater demand for home labor.

"The period of exclusiveness is past. The expansion of our trade and commerce is the pressing problem. Commercial wars are unprofitable. A policy of good will and friendly trade relations will prevent reprisals. Reciprocity treaties are in harmony with the spirit of the times; measures of retaliation are not. If perchance some of our tariffs are no longer needed for revenue or to encourage and protect our industries at home, why should they not be employed to extend and promote our markets abroad?"

GENERAL RECIPROCITY THE KEY TO FOREIGN MARKETS AND PROSPERITY.

There is a way to get the markets required for the development of American industry and to keep the wheels of industry going at full speed. Reciprocity is the way—reciprocity as a settled and general policy, a permanent part of a reasonable protective system. And reciprocity is the way to permanent general prosperity.

The case for reciprocity is proved by actual experience. We had reciprocity with Canada between 1854 and 1865. From the day it went into effect and until the Civil War broke out our exports to Canada rapidly increased. Reciprocity had been an unqualified success. The treaty was abrogated by us, not for commercial but for political reasons arising out of the Civil War. We closed the door against Canada in 1865 and Canada refused to reopen it in 1911.

But reciprocity is not to be judged by our relations with Canada or any single country. Reciprocity is a policy for universal application.

THE RECENT CANADIAN TREATY NOT TRUE RECIPROCITY.

The case for general reciprocity should now be considered quite apart from Canadian experience. In fact, the recent reciprocity treaty, which resulted in the opening of the American market to wood pulp without quid pro quo and put the American industry under free trade unconditionally and without reference to the acceptance of the treaty by Canada, is an illustration of what reciprocity is not and of what is not scientific tariff revision. Trade relations with only one country do not afford a basis for the consideration of international reciprocity. The great mistake in the Canadian treaty itself was that it was framed without reference to the general tariff system of the United States and without any consideration of the economic and political relations of either Canada or the United States with Great Britain.

THE TRADE COMMISSION TO CENTRAL AND SOUTH AMERICA.

There are other countries with which our trade is much more important than with Canada. The nearest to us are the Republics of Central and South America. After much discussion, some investigation, and a little experiment, the opportunity for American products in Central and South America is still unseized. The commercial conditions existing among the countries of North America and South America are the same that existed in the United States before the adoption of the Constitution. Alexander Hamilton, the father of protection, found it consistent with that doctrine to remove all the restrictions upon commerce between the States. What followed justified his foresight. That other high priest of protection, James G. Blaine, contemplated a policy of universal fair trade over both American continents, from Hudson Bay to Cape Horn. In 1881 President Arthur sent a trade commission to South and Central America to plan an American Zollverein, or "customs union." The results were mainly educational, save that the Hawaiian reciprocity treaty was negotiated, with results that became important and historic in annexation 12 years later.

THE PAN AMERICAN CONGRESS AND THE M'KINLEY BILL.

The second national impulse toward general reciprocity began in 1889 when Blaine again became Secretary of State. The momentous Pan American Congress was then convened at Washington. To the representatives of all-America, as well as to our own Congress, Mr. Blaine submitted his plan for an American customs union. The result was a clause in the McKinley tariff bill, then pending, providing that "the President be authorized without further legislation to declare the ports of the United States free and open to all the products of any nation of the American hemisphere whenever or so long as such nation shall admit" the flour, corn meal, breadstuffs, etc., of the United States free of all taxes. The Secretary urged Congress to seize this opportunity to open the markets of 40,000,000 people to the products of American farmers. But Blaine's plan was killed by the Senate under leaders acting for the woolgrowers and their allies, the beneficiaries of the wool tariff—the notorious Schedule K. Nevertheless, a modified form of the Blaine proposal did get into the McKinley tariff bill of 1890. It was great in its consequences though wrought in a grudging spirit. For the principle was admitted and reciprocity was established as a permanent part of the American protective system. Under the "reciprocity section" of the McKinley tariff of 1890 the President was authorized to withhold free entry of certain free-listed goods—raw sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides—from any nation that should refuse to grant us a quid pro quo.

A LITTLE RECIPROCITY PROVED A POWERFUL LEAVEN.

Under this niggardly provision a dozen trade agreements were entered into. All these agreements with foreign countries were greatly to our advantage. Germany abolished its long-standing prohibition against American hogs and gave us the full benefit of its "conventional" tariff on all agricultural products. Austria-Hungary gave us the rates of "the most favored nation" on 2,000 separate items of American export.

But all these reciprocity arrangements under section 3 of the McKinley bill were brought summarily to an end on August 27, 1894, by the passage of the Wilson tariff bill, which annulled that section.

Meanwhile, this second national effort at general reciprocity had abundantly justified itself. It fell in an era of unprecedented commercial depression. It lightened that depression by a marked stimulation of foreign trade. Thus, for example, our annual exports to Germany just before the beginning of this experiment amounted to ninety millions. In the midst of the four-year period of reciprocity they rose to one hundred and three millions; and immediately after the canceling of the reciprocity agreement they fell to eighty-eight millions.

RESULTS UNDER THE DINGLEY TARIFF JUSTIFIED RECIPROCITY.

Our third national movement toward general reciprocity began in 1897. The Dingley tariff bill empowered the President, with the consent of the Senate, to make a reciprocity treaty with any country. He was authorized to offer three inducements: First, reduction of the duty upon any article in the whole tariff list to the extent of not more than 20 per cent; second, transfer to the free list of any article that was a natural product of the foreign country, but not of ours; third, guaranty that any article on the free list should be kept there. Secretary Hay negotiated and signed 11 advantageous treaties with foreign nations under this section 4 of the Dingley Act. They were all pigeonholed and killed in the United States Senate by the same senatorial powers of privilege that cut the heart out of the Blaine reciprocity plan.

But the Dingley bill contained another reciprocity section—section 3. Under this section certain limited reciprocity agreements could be entered into without the consent of the Senate.

Nine trade agreements have been made under section 3, and seven of them are still in operation. Secretary Hay made extraordinary bargains with France, Germany, Italy, and Portugal.

Germany, for instance, conceded to all imports from the United States the full and unqualified benefit of her "conventional" tariff—a specially low tariff created by Germany for her European neighbors.

Without injury to a single American industry, without eliciting a single murmur of complaint in this country, Secretary Hay secured from Germany a guaranty against discrimination in any article of our export trade. This agreement, so cheaply purchased, was of marked political advantage also. It established more amicable relations than had ever before existed between the German and American peoples.

The immediate effect was a decided increase in our exports to Germany from $155,800,000 in 1899 to $191,800,000 in 1901 and to $249,555,926 in 1910. Our imports from that country in 1910 were $168,805,137.

This reciprocity agreement with Germany was terminated on the 7th of February, 1910.

FURTHER SUCCESS UNDER PAYNE-ALDRICH MAXIMUM AND MINIMUM PROVISIONS.

The Payne-Aldrich tariff contained provisions for the imposition of minimum rates instead of maximum, in the discretion of the President, in return for equivalent consideration from other countries. The minimum rates have been generally granted. Under this policy the exports of the United States increased from a value of $1,744,984,720 in the year ending June 30, 1910, to a value of $2,204,422,409 in the year ending June 30, 1912, and imports increased in the same period from $1,557,819,988 in 1910 to $1,653,264,934 in 1912, an increase in the total volume of international trade from $3,302,804,708 to $3,857,687,343, and an increase in the excess of exports over imports from $187,164,732 to $551,157,475, or a difference of $363,992,743 in two years. We have given reciprocity several brief trials, and in every trial our foreign trade has increased. Our experience has been just sufficient to show that reciprocal trade agreements always find a response in stimulated foreign trade.

OUR FAILURE TO APPLY GENERAL RECIPROCITY TO FOREIGN TRADE DISGRACEFUL.

But we can not congratulate ourselves upon our success in building up a foreign trade. As a matter of fact, considering the obvious possibilities, the record of the United States is one of disgraceful failure. Our exports, it is true, almost equal those of Great Britain, but our population is twice as great and our area thirty times as great. Our imports are about half those of Great Britain. Germany, with a population only two-thirds as great and an area one-eighteenth as great, almost equals us in exports and exceeds us by one-third in imports. The volume of exports of the United States is, moreover, still made up largely of foodstuffs and crude materials for use in manufacture, which our prosperity should require us to retain for our own use.

OUR NONRECIPROCAL POLICY EXCLUDES AMERICAN MANUFACTURES FROM FOREIGN MARKETS.

The exports of Great Britain increased from $1,463,000,000 in 1904 to $2,094,467,000 in 1910, the latest year in which figures for comparison are available, or almost 50 per cent, and the imports from $1,051,000,000 to $3,300,738,000, or over 300 per cent. The exports of Germany increased from $1,242,000,000 in 1904 to $1,778,969,000 in 1910, or more than 45 per cent, and the imports from $937,000,000 to $2,126,322,000, or more than 125 per cent. The exports of the United States increased from $1,117,000,000 in 1904 to $1,744,984,720 in 1910, an increase of 56 per cent, and the imports increased from $731,000,000 to $1,557,819,998, or 109 per cent. Of the increase in the exports of the United States, however, 25 per cent was in exports to North America, and over 20 per cent was in agricultural products, which should be required at home by reason of expanding manufactures. Whereas a considerable part of the volume of exports from the United States is still made up of agricultural products only about 11 per cent of the merchandise sold abroad by Germany can by the most liberal construction be classified as such. Great Britain, moreover, sends forth nothing of this class that cuts an appreciable figure. In 1904 the manufactures of Great Britain, our closest competitor, constituted 82 per cent of her sales to foreign countries, while farm products, including wool and hides, accounted for only 3 per cent of the remainder. Almost one dollar in every three which came to Great Britain from her foreign business was paid for textiles, while the United States received for these out of every dollar only 2 cents. Some 65 per cent of our total exports in 1904 are represented by the seven items—cotton, provisions, breadstuffs, mineral oils, lumber, copper, and animals. Raw cotton alone represented 25 per cent.

FIFTY-EIGHT MILLION DOLLARS THE TOTAL INCREASE IN SEVEN YEARS OF AMERICAN EXPORTS TO THREE-FOURTHS OF THE EARTH.

Our growth in exports to Europe was from $1,057,930,131 in 1904 to $1,308,275,778 in 1911, or less than 25 per cent, as against an increase in exports to North America from $234,909,959 in 1904 to $457,059,179 in 1911, or almost 100 per cent. The exports from the United States to Asia and Oceania in 1904 aggregated $93,002,028, but in 1905 they reached $161,584,046, which figure they never reached again, being in 1911 only $151,489,741. The decrease from the 1904 total exports to Africa and other countries of $24,230,126 varied each year, the figure in 1911 being $23,600,607. The increase of exports to South America was from $50,755,027 in 1904 to $108,894,894 in 1911. This increase of $58,000,000 in exports to South America represented the total gain in the exports of the United States to three great continents during the most progressive period of their history out of a total gain in exports of $896,549,000, or about 6 per cent increase in exports to an area outside of the North American Continent equal to more than three-quarters of the earth. The percentage increases, moreover, in the foreign trade of the United States are calculated upon aggregates representing beginnings disgracefully small. Despite these apparent increases the painful truth is that in foreign trade the United States of America, the greatest and most progressive nation on earth, has not made a start.

GAIN ELSEWERE LIMITED TO "DUMPED" PRODUCTS OF MONOPOLY.

Practically the only American manufacturers getting a substantial share of the trade in foreign markets are those enjoying a domestic monopoly, and even they are required in most cases to sell their products in the foreign market at a far less price than the American people pay for them at home. The proportion of these products in our total exports is very large. Exports of manufactures of iron and steel, for example, including agricultural implements, practically all of which manufactures are monopolized in the United States and sold abroad at lower prices than at home, aggregated in 1912, $273,794,267, or almost 14 per cent of our total exports.

WE ARE HOPELESSLY OUTSTRIPPED IN LATIN AMERICA.

Our failure is most conspicuous in Central America and South America. Until 1904 our exports thitherto remained practically stationary for 20 years, and to some countries we now sell less than we did 8, 10, and 15 years ago. But the purchases of the countries in this territory have not remained stationary. The markets, always potentially great, have expanded under the efforts of European interests.

In 1904 we supplied less than 13 per cent of the $374,000,000 bought in that year by South American countries. This means that South America spent $7 in Europe to every $1 in the United States. In 1904 the South American countries took a less percentage of our total exports than in 1870. Yet South America presents a market of 45,000,000 people.

AFRICA BUYS ALMOST NOTHING FROM US.

In 1904 the total import of Africa was greater than that of all North America, but we supplied only 5½ per cent of it. And Africa presents a market of 170,000,000 people.

OUR EXPORTS TO ASIA INSIGNIFICANT.

In Asia, too, but for the improvement in the Japanese and Chinese trade, the showing would now be paltry. The total jump was made in one year, and it was almost 100 per cent upon the small total of our trade at that time. In China, in 1904, we sold less than 8 per cent of the total import, and in Japan less than 15 per cent, yet these two countries present a market of 475,000,000 people. Had each of these in 1903 bought 10 cents' worth from us during the year, our export would have been $8,000,000 more than it was. Compare this with the fact that the purchases of Cuba from us at that time averaged $15 per head per annum and from Canada $23 per head per annum.

ONE BILLION CUSTOMERS BUT NO BUSINESS.

These are the bases upon which the illusory percentages are figured. These are the true facts as to American progress in markets containing more than 1,000,000,000 potential customers outside of North America and Europe. Asia and Oceania alone contain 900,000,000 inhabitants. Our rivals sell them twelve times as much as we sell them. It is estimated that our total exports of merchandise to all South America, Oceania, and Asia combined brought in 1904 a per capita return to the people of the United States of less than 15 cents a month. The British East Indies, with a population of three and a half times that of our own country, spend 98½ cents out of every dollar with other countries than the United States.

RECIPROCITY THE REMEDY FOR THE RESULTS OF EXCLUSION.

The conditions which have been set forth are the result of a deliberate policy of exclusion adopted and maintained by the Government of the United States for a half century. These conditions can be brought to an end only by a deliberate policy of commercial reciprocity. The large quantities of sugar, wool, flax, and many other food products that we import from abroad do not come into competition in the ordinary sense with the domestic products. In many of these things we are not, and there is no indication that we ever shall be, able to supply our domestic demand from domestic sources. In some most important articles, like wool, hides and skins, lumber, and sugar, the domestic supply as compared with the demand, or even the consumption, is lessening all the time. Yet we have been unwilling to give either the domestic buyer or the foreign seller the benefit of any reduction in duties on this class of articles.

SUPERFLUOUS PROTECTION DESIGNED TO CLOSE FOREIGN MARKETS TO AMERICAN PRODUCTS.

The result of the policy of high protection has been threefold, and it has been ruinous in every way. The tax on imports has been made a burden on production equivalent to a tax on the exportation of the goods into the cost of producing which the tax enters. Instead of a means of keeping foreign products out of the United States, it has become primarily the means of keeping the products of the United States out of foreign markets. The tax on imports has become a tax on exports. This policy has also established an artificial price level, which has kept our products, without any advantage to the United States, out of foreign markets. And it has left unused the quid pro quo which we might offer, with benefit, in addition, to ourselves, of admission for the products of foreign countries free to our markets in exchange for admission of some of our products to theirs.

EXCLUSION DESIGNED FOR THE ADVANTAGE OF MONOPOLY.

As a matter of fact, American manufacturers are producing almost everything to-day cheaper than their foreign competitors. It is clearly obvious that the only need American manufacturers have of a tariff is to protect them in high exactions from American people. The sale of American goods abroad at a lower price than that demanded of domestic consumers is a fixed rule. The total cost of "making the market" is charged to the American consumer, and the sales cost is a considerable proportion of the retail price, on many articles as much as one-half. The establishment by fair competition of a reasonable price level would reduce the sales cost or cost of distribution in both the home market and in foreign markets. How much more could be sold in the foreign markets if only a reasonable "one-price" level were established and the import tax, which works as an export tax, were abolished. The average manufacturer would accept willingly a reduction in duties if he could be assured that a steadier and greater volume of sales would result. Every expansion of American industry beneficial to the people has resulted from such reductions. They have been too rare.

REDUCTIONS SHOULD BE MADE TO BENEFIT ALL.

Some Massachusetts shoe manufacturers were alarmed at the sale in this country of a small order of English shoes as a result of the recent reduction of the protection on shoes from 25 per cent, until it was pointed out that the same reduction was followed by an enormous increase of exports of Massachusetts-made shoes.

There is no reason why our people should not have the peculiar kind of shoes bought from England, nor any reason why our manufacturers shouldn't be challenged to make them. That is the best possible lead for manufacturers who desire to capture foreign markets.

In the same way there is no reason why the Dutch standard of color should be maintained in the tariff on sugar to keep out the low-priced pure dark sugar, which our people were formerly glad to use, just to give the Sugar Trust a monopoly of sugar refining.

Tariff reduction is therefore desirable in itself; reductions should be made wherever fairness and the common interest will permit them.

GETTING SQUARE WITH BIG BUSINESS A DANGEROUS BASIS OF REDUCTION.

The recent general increases in exports are made up largely of the products of the great monopolistic combinations. They have not been beneficial to American industry generally or to the people, and have resulted from superfluous rates of duty. The present high tariff has unquestionably fostered monopoly. The Democratic Congress is undoubtedly resolved upon a tariff policy that will punish the monopolies for their exactions from the people. But such a policy will surely result in two years or four years of depression under ill-considered tariff legislation, to be followed by a popular rebuke to the Democrats for giving their attention to a rebuke to the monopolies instead of to the interests of the people, and the tariff will be made a political football for years to come. Emphatic notice should be served upon them that no rate in the existing tariff law should be changed unless it can be shown that such change will open up new markets to American industry, reduce the cost of production at home, or benefit the great mass of the American people.

Manufacturers must readjust their business to every change in the tariff, and impending tariff changes are always regarded with apprehension by the business world and attended by commercial depression and hard times.

There is no justification for any tariff change which brings about such results. Such results are absolutely unnecessary. Tariff changes in the future should be such that they will be looked forward to by manufacturers as an assurance of new and favorable markets for their goods, or of opportunities to reduce the cost of production, by the commercial world as indications of better times, and by the people generally as a means of reducing the cost of living. Every tariff change should have its quid pro quo for the people, and no legislator should dare to lay a finger upon existing rates except for the benefit of the people.

FOREIGN TRADE AND MERCHANT MARINE GO TOGETHER.

The same neglect which has resulted in our lack of foreign trade has caused us to be without an adequate merchant marine. We have abandoned the foreign markets and the carrying trade to other nations. The two go together. The total foreign trade of Great Britain for 1910 was $5,395,205,000; the foreign trade of the United States for that year was $3,302,804,708. The tonnage of the merchant navy of Great Britain in 1910 was 19,133,870; that of the United States for that year was 7,508,082. It is reasonable to suppose that an increase in our foreign commerce will result in an increase in our carrying trade and the establishment of an adequate American merchant marine.

BOTH MAKE FOR INTERNATIONAL PEACE.

Even if peace is to be preserved only by war, the enlarged merchant navy which an expanding foreign trade will produce is absolutely necessary. But in any case a merchant marine is a better aid to international peace than warships, and commercial relations of mutual profit which produce the merchant navy are a surer guaranty of international friendship than treaties of peace or of arbitration.

It is the duty of Congress to adapt its readjustment of tariff schedules through provision for reciprocal commercial agreements to the purposes of international peace. This may be done at the same time and by the same provisions by which our foreign commerce and our merchant marine are to be built up.

FOREIGN TRADE AND THE MERCHANT MARINE THE SOLUTION OF THE CURRENCY PROBLEM.

But all trade relations are reducible to terms of money. The test of an economic system is the financial system it produces. If Congress can not correct evils in the financial system of the United States through tariff changes, no changes would better be made. The protection which has kept our products out of foreign markets has been an irresistible inducement to domestic competitors, limited to the home market, to combine to restrict production in that market and thereby to secure the total margin of price between the low price level, where domestic competition ceases, and the high level, where foreign competition begins. This kind of protection has been the shelter for the exactions of monopoly and the real cause of almost all restraint of trade. The tariff has been the mother of trusts, but the tariff combine has been the trust of trusts. The monopolized industries of the United States have come into the power of the so-called money trust, which has a monopoly of credit. The tariff has, in the same way as credit, been turned by natural evolution and concentration from its original purpose of stimulating domestic production to a means of holding American industry within such limits as suit the private interests which, as the political trust, has heretofore enjoyed and may hereafter enjoy the power, based upon its control of the tariff and monopolized industries and as the basis of such control, to manipulate credit.

A VOTE AGAINST RECIPROCITY A VOTE FOR THE SO-CALLED MONEY TRUST.

Now, the basis of credit is gold. With the abandonment of our foreign trade and the carrying trade we abandoned our share in the control of the world's gold supply. By reason of our failure to secure markets for the potential products of our vast producing machinery we do not export enough to pay the interest on foreign money invested in the United States. We are a debtor Nation. We lend no real money; we control no real money. Our financiers do not represent us, but a foreign money power. Their tariff policy has not been inconsistent with their obligation to serve their foreign principals. Precisely the trap into which the unwary Democratic legislator is likely to fall is the reduction of duties without reference to the opportunity of American manufacturers generally in the foreign markets and the favoring of importers, without quid pro quo, who are really allied with the foreign interests which profit by our monopolistic tariff policy of exclusion of our own products from foreign markets. The products of the monopolies get to foreign markets, it is true, but at a low price level, for which American industry generally and the American consumer must compensate in the payment of artificially high domestic prices. The purpose of tariff reductions should be to bring about as low a price level at home as that met by our monopolies in foreign markets, so that not foreign consumers and foreign producers may profit from those prices but our consumers and our producers as well, and so that all may enjoy equal opportunities to get trade in foreign markets.

Under such a system our merchant marine will expand, and we shall retain part of the $300,000,000 in freight money paid by us to foreign shipowners for carrying freight originating and controlled in large part in the United States and the amount to be added thereto by the expansion of the carrying trade of our merchant marine. Freight money means gold, and a free American merchant marine means an unconcentrated American control of gold, the basis of credit. Since it is universally conceded that the chief difficulty in our financial system is the concentration of the control of credit and the unreal and therefore inelastic basis of our banking credits represented by bonds which, as the President says, the Government made the basis of our banking and currency system 50 years ago only that it might market them, it is evident that the real remedy for the evils of our banking and currency system is to draw a share of the world's gold to our banks through the earning of freight money in the carrying trade and the expansion of our foreign trade to that end through reciprocity. It is in this same way, and in no other, that proper financial credit is to be apportioned to agricultural enterprise and the grip of the so-called Money Trust on natural resources, through their use of other people's money and their monopoly of credit, is to be loosened. In all these things the legislator's mind should dwell upon the quid pro quo for the whole American people and the application of the principle of reciprocity, for that is the beginning and the ending of the true method of tariff making in the interest of the American people.

RECIPROCITY AND THE PANAMA CANAL THE BEGINNING OF A NEW ERA.

The opening of the Panama Canal will inaugurate a new era in commercial history. Distances hitherto almost prohibitive of trade will be utterly annihilated. The ends of the earth will be brought within reach of one another for the transportation of commodities. The American people should celebrate this event by bringing their industries, through reciprocity, into communication with the most distant markets and preparing to share in the tremendous increase of foreign trade to which the opening of the canal will give its impetus. The policy of reciprocity is just as workable as the policy of high protection or the policy of free trade. The main difference between these policies and the policy of reciprocity is that reciprocity alone aims neither at retaliation nor in the abandonment of the power to retaliate, but at the recognition of that power in others, and at the use of that power not for mutual damage but for mutual benefit.

THE LEGISLATURE'S DUTY TO MEMORIALIZE CONGRESS.

Gentlemen of the general court, a large majority of you are Republicans. Yet you stood with the Democrats in the political revolution which we have witnessed for a common principle. If you had not done so this revolution would not have been brought about. You know that Democratic victory in the last election was a declaration for protective downward revision through the application of the policy of general reciprocity—the Massachusetts plan of constructive tariff reduction. But you also know that precisely the reverse of this plan is likely to be put into effect by the Democratic Congress, a nonprotective, tariff for revenue only, unreciprocal, destructive upward and equally destructive downward revision. It is your right, it is your privilege, it is your duty to memorialize Congress in behalf of this Commonwealth against such a peril to the interests of Massachusetts. The President has invited all, irrespective of party allegiance, to cooperate with him in the purposes outlined in his inaugural address. Sound tradition and good principle justify a memorial of a State legislature to Congress. I recommend that through such a memorial you communicate to Congress the desire of the people of Massachusetts that in all tariff making it apply the principle of protective reduction through reciprocity to the end that the tariff question may be put in the way of permanent settlement and a progressive policy of development of American commerce entered upon.

WHAT RECIPROCITY AND PROTECTIVE REDUCTION WILL DO.

Let the United States get her foodstuffs free of duty and free raw materials for her industries and her manufacturers will not only not ask for unreasonable rates to protect their manufactured products, but will soon give willing consent to constant reductions until a fair trade basis, the equivalent of a free-trade basis, shall be, if ever, safely reached. Equal opportunity in the home market and a fair chance in the foreign market is all that the American manufacturer asks. With the reduction of the tariff will come an expansion of our foreign trade. When we have secured the foreign markets, concern for the home market will be past. Unless we gain the foreign markets the home market will cease to expand to its normal measure. Increased exports will bring about the establishment of an American merchant marine. The drawing of American freight money to our banks will strengthen our financial position, give us profits that we now abandon to other nations, and furnish us with a basis of a sound monetary system. The carrying trade is thus an integral part of a national system of industry and commerce. Free intercourse with other nations has a value in itself. A merchant marine is a better aid to international peace than warships, and commercial relations of mutual profit are a surer guaranty of international friendship than treaties of peace or of arbitration. With the policy of reduction should be coupled, therefore, a program of reciprocal trade agreements with all nations. To fail to reduce the tariff and to abandon reciprocity at this time is to abandon the future of American commerce, to give up hope, and to give way to complacency—or despair. The Republican attitude assumed that there are no more markets open to American producers. We should say most emphatically that to the products of American labor no market should be closed. Take off that part of the price which results from superfluous protection and the demand will be increased 50 per cent in the domestic market alone, and through his new-found power to compete and sensible reciprocity arrangements the American manufacturer will have his share in the new commerce to arise from the opening of the Panama Canal and the American people will have their part in the expansion of every continent on earth.

EUGENE N. FOSS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolutions and accompanying paper will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LODGE presented a memorial of sundry cotton manufacturers of New Bedford, Mass., remonstrating against the proposed rates in Schedule I of the pending tariff bill, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Board of Trade of Provincetown, Mass., favoring the repeal of the clause in the Panama Canal act exempting coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls, which were referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

Mr. WILLIAMS presented a memorial of the Mississippi Choctaw Nation of Indians, relative to their rights as Indian citizens, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I present a resolution of the Legislature of Michigan, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

House resolution 79.

Whereas a bill has been introduced in Congress (H. R. 27661) providing for the creation of a bureau of farm loans under the control and direction of the Secretary of the Treasury for the purpose of lending money to bona fide tillers of the soil upon farm mortgages, the loans not to exceed 60 per cent of the value of the property and the rate of interest not to exceed 4½ per cent per annum: Therefore be it

Resolved by the house (the senate concurring), That our Senators and Representatives in Congress at Washington be and are hereby requested to earnestly advocate and support said bill; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of the above resolution be sent to the United States Senators and Representatives in Congress from Michigan.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I present a resolution of the Legislature of Michigan, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

House resolution 110.

Whereas the War Department has under consideration the matter of the concentration of the United States troops in larger bodies than heretofore and at places more centrally located, and consequently the abandonment of many of the existing Army posts, among which is the new Army post of Fort Brady at Sault Ste. Marie, Mich.; and

Whereas Fort Brady is now one of the best and most modern Army posts in the United States, advantageously situated and comprising 80 acres of land, with present accommodations for four companies of soldiers, having ample grounds for the accommodation of a regiment or more, and convenient to it approximately 50,000 acres of State and Government lands set aside for forest reserve, and admirably adapted for rifle ranges and maneuver grounds; and

Whereas owing to the climatic conditions, with an abundance of pure air and water, Fort Brady is recognized as the most healthful Army post in America, and has a record for the health and recuperation of our soldiers unequaled by any other Army post in the country; and

Whereas the great highway of commerce on the Great Lakes and the highway of commerce between the United States and Canada converge at Sault Ste. Marie, and the commerce passing through this great gateway is of such magnitude that it is of vital interest to our whole country that these highways of commerce be protected, the commerce on the Lakes passing this place having grown from nothing 50 years ago to 72,000,000 tons in the year 1912, and valued in round numbers at $790,000,000, while the commerce by land has also reached an enormous sum; and

Whereas the United States Government has large interests at Sault Ste. Marie, having made vast improvements there and having other improvements in contemplation, and having already expended in the constructions of the great locks and the other improvements about $16,000,000, which with the other improvements now in contemplation and under way will increase the amount to $25,000,000; and

Whereas Fort Brady is situated at the border of our country and on the great highways of commerce, both foreign and inland, by land and by water, a commerce which in its magnitude affects nearly every State in the Union, and the post is, therefore, strategically located for the protection of this great volume of commerce and vast public works from riots and the country's possible future invasions; and

Whereas owing to the large interests of the United States Government centering at Sault Ste. Marie it is important to the country at large that these great highways of commerce and important Government works be protected, and because this is a strategical position for an Army post in case of riots or invasions it is deemed for the best interests of the country that the Army post of Fort Brady be not abandoned, but that it be retained and enlarged to a regimental post: Therefore be it

Resolved by the house (the senate concurring), That it is deemed for the best interests of the State of Michigan and for the country at large that the Army post of Fort Brady, at Sault Ste. Marie, Mich., be maintained and enlarged to a full regimental post; and be it further

Resolved, That our Senators and Representatives be, and they are hereby, requested to use all honorable means to secure the continuance of Fort Brady as an Army post, and to have the same increased to a full regimental post; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be presented to the Secretary of War and to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I present a resolution of the Legislature of Michigan, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

House resolution 57.

Whereas the so-called "inland route," comprising the waters known as Cheboygan River, Mullett Lake, Indian River, Burt Lake, Crooked River, and Crooked Lake is, and has been for seven years and upward last past, under the jurisdiction of the Federal Government; and

Whereas during such time nothing has been done by the Federal Government in the way of improving or keeping in proper condition the said inland route; and

Whereas the said inland route as a highway of navigation is of great importance to the people of Michigan, the same being known throughout the country, not only as an avenue of commerce, but for its beautiful natural scenery, and being traversed by thousands of people each year; and

Whereas, owing to the neglect and failure of the proper authorities to keep the said inland route in proper condition and to remove therefrom débris and other obstructions, the said route as an avenue of navigation has become extremely dangerous, such condition having resulted in the loss of life: Therefore be it

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That the Congress of the United States be, and is hereby, respectfully requested to take whatever action may be necessary to secure a speedy and practical improvement of the said so-called "inland route."

Mr. TOWNSEND. I present a resolution of the Legislature of Michigan, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

House resolution 75.

Whereas a bill has been introduced in the United States Senate amending the general national banking laws so that national banks may loan money with real estate as security: Therefore be it

Resolved by the house (the senate concurring), That our Senators and Representatives in Congress at Washington be, and are hereby, requested to earnestly advocate and support a change in the national banking laws to the end that such banks be permitted to loan money on real estate security; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of the above resolutions be sent to the United States Senators and Representatives in Congress from Michigan.

He also presented petitions of the Woman's Christian Temperance Unions of Charlotte, Montpelier, and Bellows Falls, all in the State of Vermont, praying for the closing of the gates of the Panama Canal Exposition on Sundays, which were referred to the Committee on Industrial Expositions.

Mr. WEEKS. I present a petition of 2,500 citizens of the cities of Lawrence, New Bedford, and Fall River, Mass., relating to the tariff. I should like to have the petition read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be read.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like to inquire what paper it is that the Senator desires to have read.

Mr. WEEKS. It is a petition relating to the pending tariff bill, signed by 2,500 citizens of Massachusetts.

Mr. SIMMONS. How long is the petition?

Mr. WEEKS. It will not take half a minute to read it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to say, Mr. President, that while I shall not object to the reading of this petition, as the Senator says it will take only half a minute, I shall object to the reading of memorials which may be sent here with reference to the tariff. I shall not object to their being printed in a proper case, but I think it is unnecessarily taking the time of the Senate to read all the tariff arguments which may be sent here by the various industries.

Mr. WEEKS. In this case——

Mr. SIMMONS. I shall not object.

Mr. WEEKS. It will not take as long to read the petition as the statement the Senator just made has taken.

There being no objection, the petition was read and referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

HARTFORD, CONN., May 10, 1913.

At a meeting of the executive board of the Connecticut Leaf-Tobacco Association the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

Whereas the leaf-tobacco industry of the State of Connecticut will be seriously affected on account of the proposed new tariff law, known as the Underwood bill, and especially that part relating to the free entry of the products of the Philippine Islands, Schedule F, paragraph C, page 196; and

Whereas should this measure become a law it would be the means of reducing the price of the product of the grower of tobacco in this State and also the price of labor in all branches of the cigar and tobacco trade in the United States, the difference in the cost of labor between the Philippine Islands and this country being so great; and

Whereas the climatic conditions of the Philippine Islands are such that the culture of tobacco in those islands could be greatly increased at so low a cost that the grower, manufacturer, and the workman of this country could not exist: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, as tobacco merchants of the State of Connecticut, earnestly protest against the passage of this measure; and be it further

Resolved, That we notify our Representatives and Senators of our action and ask them to use every means in their power to defeat this unjust and unfair measure, which will directly affect over 1,000,000 people.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I ask leave to have printed as a Senate document an address recently delivered by Richard Olney on the Panama Canal toll question. (S. Doc. No. 33.)

In the same connection I ask leave to have printed as a Senate document an address delivered on the same subject by Chandler P. Anderson, formerly counsellor for the Department of State, before the American Society of International Law. (S. Doc. No. 32.)

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the order to print will be made as requested.

RANSOM OF MISS ELLEN M. STONE (S. DOC. NO. 29).

Mr. O'GORMAN. I ask to have printed as a Senate document a message from the President of the United States of March 27, 1908, relative to the repayment of money contributed for the ransom of Miss Ellen M. Stone, missionary in Turkey.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the order to print will be entered.

ADDRESS BY DR. HANNIS TAYLOR (S. DOC. NO. 31).

Mr. VARDAMAN. At a meeting of the American Society of International Law, held in this city on the 26th of April last, a very interesting paper was read by Dr. Hannis Taylor on "What is the international obligation of the United States, if any, under the treaties, in view of the British contention?" I ask that the paper be printed as a public document.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not hear what the Senator from Mississippi said was the title of the article.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Dr. Taylor responded to the toast "What is the international obligation of the United States, if any, under the treaties, in view of the British contention?" It is a very able paper.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the paper will be printed as a public document.

PROGRESSIVENESS OF THE UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT (S. DOC. NO. 30).

Mr. LODGE. I ask that the paper which I send to the desk may be printed as a public document. It is a compilation by Mr. Charles Warren, a distinguished lawyer of Boston, in regard to certain decisions of the United States courts relative to recent legislation. It is a very valuable compilation and is brief.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there is no objection, that order will be made.

Mr. FLETCHER. I did not hear the request of the Senator from Massachusetts as to the paper he desired to have printed as a public document.

Mr. LODGE. It is an article which appeared in the Columbia Law Review, April, 1913, and is really a compilation of all the recent decisions under the pure-food law, under the antitrust laws, and under the railroad laws. It is a very useful and brief pamphlet by a lawyer of distinction.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there is no objection, the request of the Senator from Massachusetts will be granted. The Chair hears none.

RECALL OF JUDICIAL DECISIONS (S. DOC. NO. 28).

Mr. NELSON. I have a brief article by Ezra Ripley Thayer, dean of the law school of Harvard University, taken from the Legal Bibliography of March, 1913, on the "Recall of judicial decisions." I ask that the article be printed as a public document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS (S. DOC. NO. 27).

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I have a brief paper, being a very interesting official statement by the president of the Associated Press, Mr. Frank B. Noyes, which has been made with some care and thoroughness, showing the aims, objects, and purposes of that organization. I ask that the statement be printed as a public document, and also that it be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS.

(By Frank B. Noyes, president of the Associated Press.)

Probably no institution is more widely known by name than the Associated Press, and, on the other hand, more vaguely understood by the public generally as to its organization and its functions. For whatever cause this may be, that it is a fact is daily apparent.

The Associated Press is an association of something over 850 newspapers, operating under a charter of the State of New York as a mutual and cooperative organization for the interchange and collection of news. Under the terms of its charter "the corporation is not to make a profit nor to make or declare dividends, and is not to engage in the business of selling intelligence nor traffic in the same."

In other words, the Associated Press is simply a common agent of its members by which they arrange an interchange of the news that each collects and is bound by its membership obligation to contribute for the common use of its fellow members and also as the agency through which reports of foreign and certain classes of domestic happenings are collected and distributed to the newspapers served by the organization.

The fact that in the present year we celebrate the twentieth anniversary of the first nation-wide cooperative and nonprofit-making news-gathering organization in the world seems to make the publication of something respecting it timely.

The Associated Press is in no wise the master of the newspapers constituting its membership; it is distinctly their servant.

Its board of directors is composed of active newspaper men chosen at annual meetings by the membership, and, in an experience running through 20 years of legitimate connection with the present organization and also that of the older Illinois corporation, I have never known an instance in all the changing personnel of boards of directors when there was any departure from the most rigid observance of the highest obligations of trusteeship and disregard of private and selfish interests. The president, vice presidents, and members of the board of directors serve without salaries.

The Associated Press of to-day is the outcome of a many-year struggle between two opposing systems. One, that of news-gathering concerns with private or limited ownership, which dealt at arm's length with newspapers to which they sold news at such profit as might be secured and over which the newspapers who bought from them had no more control than over the paper mill supplying them with print paper.

The other system is based on the theory that a powerful, privately owned and controlled news-gathering agency is a menace to the press and people.

Determined to establish an agency subject only to the control of the newspapers for whom it acted, in 1893 a group of western men composing the Western Associated Press began a fight to attain this end, and since that time a contest between these two opposing principles has been waged. In asserting that the Associated Press, as to-day constituted, is the servant and agent only of the newspapers for which it acts I have no thought of minimizing the tremendous importance of the work it does as such an agent, but wish simply to emphasize the thought that properly speaking it has no entity of its own, no mission save to serve its members.

Its members are scattered from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from Canada to the Gulf, and represent every possible shade of political belief, religious faith, and economic sympathy. It is obvious that the Associated Press can have no partisan nor factional bias, no religious affiliation, no capitalistic nor prolabor trend.

Its function is simply to furnish its members with a truthful, clean, comprehensive, nonpartisan—and this in its broadest sense—report of the news of the world as expeditiously as is compatible with accuracy and as economically as possible.

To do this the newspapers composing its membership contribute, first, the news of their localities, and, second, weekly assessments of money aggregating about $3,000,000 per annum, with which an extensive system of leased wires is maintained (22,000 miles of wire in the daytime and 28,000 miles of wire at night), bureaus in the principal American cities supplementing and collating the news of local newspapers and bureaus for the original collection of news throughout the world.

The volume of the news report to members varies greatly, ranging from 500 words daily by telegraph or telephone to papers able to utilize but a small amount of general news matter to more than 50,000 words daily or 35 newspaper columns in the more important cities.

The method of collecting foreign news has been greatly changed in recent years. Formerly the Associated Press collected its foreign service in London, receiving the news there of the Reuter Co., of the Wolff Agency of Germany, and of the Havas Agency of France, with smaller affiliated agencies in Italy and Spain.

The objection to this method was that the news as received in London was alleged to be impressed with an English bias; in any event it was concededly not collected from an American viewpoint.

To meet this criticism the Associated Press has established regular bureaus of its own in all the great news centers, and now maintains offices and staffs in London, Paris, Berlin, Rome, St. Petersburg, Vienna, Tokyo, Peking, Mexico City, and Habana, in addition to hundreds of individual correspondents scattered throughout the world.

It is probable that in the foreign news field the extraordinary genius of Melville E. Stone, the general manager of the Associated Press, has been most strikingly exhibited. Just prior to the Russo-Japanese War Mr. Stone secured from the Czar of Russia the abolition of the censorship, and newspaper men still remember the remarkable frankness with which the Russian Government gave out the news of Russia's reverses in that conflict.

Orders expediting the messages of the Associated Press were issued at his instance by the German, French, Italian, and Russian Governments, and as a result it has come to be common for European capitals to get the first news of Continental events through Associated Press reports cabled back from New York.

One beneficial result coming from this more direct relationship is to be found in the minimizing of the ill effect of the occasional outbreak of some utterly inconsequential German, French, English, or Japanese "yellow" sporadically abusing the United States and its people.

Formerly profound significance of a widespread hostility was attached to such outpourings. With the closer understanding that comes from more intimate knowledge, we now understand the relative importance of the newspapers of other countries as we are able to weigh and grade our own.

The disadvantage of lack of news touch is strikingly apparent in the relations of the United States with the Central and South American nations. These countries secure their news of the United States by way of Europe, and it consists mainly of murders, lynchings, and embezzlements. The antipathy to the United States by the people of these countries is undoubtedly largely due to the false perspective given by their newspapers. If in truth we were the kind of people they are led to believe we are, they would be fully justified in their attitude.

It has been the aim of those intrusted with the management of the Associated Press to secure as its representatives both at home and abroad men of high character and attainments, and it may, I think, be fairly assumed that the reputation for accuracy and fairness that its service enjoys is largely to be attributed to an unusual measure of success in this endeavor.

While the Associated Press is generally held in good esteem, I would not be understood as indicating that it has been exempt from criticism and attack.

If in a campaign all the candidates, or their managers or press agents, did not accuse the Associated Press of the grossest partisanship as against the particular candidacy in which they were interested, those bearing the responsibilities of the service would feel convinced that something was radically wrong, and would look with suspicion on the report themselves.

This is but human nature. During the last campaign for the presidential nominations every candidate, either in person or by proxy, expressed his conviction that the Associated Press was favorable to somebody else.

Mr. Wilson's press agent asserted that our service was pro-CLARK, and in the opinion of Speaker CLARK we had sold out to the Wilson people. Mr. Taft's managers felt that he was not being given a fair show, and Mr. Roosevelt was firm in his conviction that the avenues of information had been choked to his disadvantage.

Of course later we know that Mr. Wilson does not share the only-for-publication views of his press agent, and Speaker CLARK is as emphatic in his withdrawal as in his hasty charges. Mr. Taft's managers realize that the Associated Press can not report speeches that he does not make, and Mr. Roosevelt must see a humorous side to the suggestion that anyone has interfered with his getting a fairly adequate representation on the first page.

With all this, however, goes a fundamental misunderstanding of the functions of the Associated Press. The individual correspondent or reporter for a given newspaper or a small group of newspapers having a common bias may be permitted to indulge in partisanship or in propaganda.

This is absolutely not to be permitted in the Associated Press. No bias of any sort can be allowed. Our function is to supply our members with news, not views; with news as it happens—not as we may want it to happen. Intensely as its management may sympathize with any movement, no propaganda in its behalf can be tolerated. Very jealously indeed does the membership guard against their agency going outside its allotted duties and argus-eyed is the censorship of every handler of our "copy."

It is not, naturally, to be claimed that no mistakes are made. They are made and will be made. But in the very nature of the business, with the heart so worn upon the sleeve, detection very swiftly follows, and the mistakes are few and far between.

The desire to enlist the Associated Press in propaganda or advocacy is usually to be found at the bottom of criticisms of its service. Added to this often is misinformation as to the real facts, and sometimes, though happily rarely, actual malice.

The service from Russia, for example, has been harshly criticized by some who thought that the province of the Associated Press was to undertake a crusade against the Russian Government because of its anti-Semitic attitude. Our theory of our obligations is that we should report the facts as they occur, without fear or favor, but that it is no part of our duty to draw indictments save as the facts alone are damning.

The case of the Koreans charged with a plot to assassinate Gov. Gen. Terauchi has recently been much discussed.

These Koreans were almost all converted Christians, and the American missionaries in Korea were naturally intensely interested in the matter.

It was freely alleged that the Associated Press, unduly influenced by the Japanese Government, had suppressed the fact that these Koreans had made confessions implicating American missionaries as accessories to the plot and had subsequently retracted these confessions, asserting that they had been extorted by atrocious torture inflicted by the Japanese police, the intimation being also that the missionaries were in peril by reason of the repudiated confessions.

Based on this, some of the missionary authorities here became much perturbed, and indeed one of the great New York papers printed news and editorial articles criticizing the Associated Press for the suppression of the matter.

As a matter of fact, an inspection of the news service received by the Associated Press and distributed to its members showed that it carried the full facts—the confessions, the implications of the missionaries, the allegations of torture, the fact that the allegation of torture was believed by the missionaries, and also the fact that the Japanese denied the torture stories and attached no credence whatever to the prisoners' statements implicating the missionaries.

On learning the real situation the New York newspaper in question promptly printed an ample amende honorable, but I do not doubt that many still ignorant of the retraction feel that the Associated Press was guilty of some dereliction.

Another cause of frequent misapprehension is in the general tendency of newspaper readers to attribute anything seen in print to the Associated Press, and it is constantly necessary to explain that some violently partisan or inaccurate article was the work of a "special" and not a part of our service.

Away back in the middle of the last century an alliance, offensive and defensive, existed between the old New York Associated Press, a news-selling organization owned by seven New York papers, and the Western Union Telegraph Co., under the terms of which the New York Associated Press dealt solely with the Western Union, and the Western Union, in turn, gave discriminating rates and advantages to the New York Associated Press.

Although this arrangement (in the light of to-day a very improper one) was abolished more than 30 years ago, many people think that it still exists, and occasionally some one arises fiercely to denounce this unholy alliance.

The simple truth is that the Associated Press has, during all these 30 years and more, paid exactly what other news associations pay and that the rates charged by the telegraph companies for the facilities furnished us are greatly in excess of those charged individual newspapers, and still more than those charged stockholders having leased wires.

The Associated Press leases wires, many thousands of miles of them, from the Western Union, the Postal, the American Telegraph & Telephone Co., and from several of the independent telephone companies.

The first three having a common basic rate, charging us $24 a mile a year in the daytime, and $12 a mile a year at night. For exactly the same wire they charge an individual newspaper $20 and $10, respectively, and a stockholder gets a still further reduction.

Far from receiving discriminatory favors, the Associated Press feels that it is being distinctly and heavily discriminated against.

In these days, when all transactions on a large scale are being subjected to so rigid a scrutiny, it is natural that so conspicuous a mark of public attention as is the Associated Press should not find itself immune from critical inspection.

From time to time some voice is raised denouncing the Associated Press in the same breath both as a monopoly and because it is not a monopoly, and insisting that it become a monopoly by admitting to its membership all desiring its service, the theory being that in some way the activities of the association impress it with a public use and subject it to the obligation of a common carrier to serve all comers.

From an ethical standpoint only, then, is there anything improper, unsafe, or unwise in a group of newspapers, large or small, associating themselves together to do a thing that each must otherwise do separately and of reserving to themselves the right to determine to what extent the membership of such a group shall be enlarged?

It does not seem possible to hold fairly that a newspaper in New York may not join with one in Chicago and one in Philadelphia to maintain a common correspondent in Washington without making it obligatory on these three newspapers to share the fruits of their enterprise with other New York, Chicago, and Philadelphia newspapers.

If, in addition, they arrange that each shall supply the others with the news of its home city, is it within the bounds of reason that they are required to furnish to competitors the same facilities?

I give this illustration because that is exactly the relation of the newspapers composing the Associated Press, the scale only being enlarged.

The obligations of a common carrier are, however, in no wise dependent on the magnitude of its transactions. The ferry sculled across a stream is just as much impressed with a public use as is the Pennsylvania Railroad. Each is a common carrier. It is the nature of the transaction and not its size that determines its obligations. As respects the question of common carriership, what is right for 3 to do is proper for 300 or for 800 to do.

To compel the Associated Press to assume an entity of its own and to serve all comers would in my judgment bring about a condition fraught with the gravest dangers to the freedom of the press and in turn to the freedom of the people.

At present about one-third of the daily newspapers of the country are represented by membership in the Associated Press.

There are a number of concerns engaged in the collection and sale of general news to nonmembers of the Associated Press, and in one way or another they supply their customers with what are declared to be satisfactory services.

In nowise desiring to become anything approaching a monopoly, the Associated Press has avoided even the appearance of any competitive price rivalry, admitting additional members solely on the ground of a common benefit to the members of a cooperative institution.

If by some occult reasoning the Associated Press could be held as a common carrier, these news-selling organizations would be wiped out and the Associated Press would, if the end sought for was accomplished, become a real monopoly, and the incentive for cooperation no longer existing, it would naturally drift into a concern for pecuniary profit in private ownership and subject to private control.

No more dangerous situation can well be imagined than the passing of the control of the greatest news-gathering and news-disseminating agency of the world from the hands of cooperating newspapers to the control of some individual interested in manipulating the news—the master and not the servant of the newspapers.

Because this danger would be so grave it will not come, but for another reason, also a very basic reason.

There can be no monopoly in news.

The day that it becomes apparent that a monopoly in collecting and distributing news exists, that day, in some way, by some method, individual newspapers or groups of newspapers will take up the work of establishing a service for themselves independent of outside control.

The news of the world is open to him who will go for it. Anyone willing to expend the energy, the time, and the money to approach it may dip from the well of truth.

The news service of the Associated Press does not consist of its leased wires or its offices. Its soul is in the personal service of human men, of men with eyes to see, with ears to hear, with hands to write, and with brains to understand; of men who are proud when they succeed, humiliated when they fail, and resentful when maligned. The telegraph wires are but the blind instruments of this service, though the wire has brought the uttermost parts of the world marvelously close. These human entities are ranging the world to send word of its doings, of its rejoicings and its sorrowings, to satisfy the thirst of the people for intelligence of the march of events.

The news service of the Associated Press of the horror of Martinique was not the event itself. It was the personal service of a man who at the first hint of the disaster that had wiped out a population took his orders, chartered a boat, and went to Martinique, where no correspondent still lived, and sent a story, his story of the great tragedy, wrecking his health by the effort required.

To get this report, this "news," was open to anyone.

To get it cost the members of the Associated Press more than $30,000, in addition to the human wastage and prodigious effort.

It was a part of the day's work.

And as to-day devoted men labor and die in order that the members of the Associated Press, an organization that neither owns nor prints a newspaper, may lay before their readers a fair picture of the world's happenings, so always will these and other men serve nobly and die bravely that the world may have tidings of sport and festival, of birth and death, of Congress and Parliament, of battle and plague, of shipwreck and rescue.

WASHED PAPER MONEY.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I again desire to offer, and ask for publication as a document, a number of brief letters I have received relating to the subject of washed money.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. Again, Mr. President, on principle I say that these letters should not be printed as a public document, and that the Senator's request should not be granted. I am going to say to the Democratic side of the Chamber that if you intend to start printing at the Government Printing Office this class of matter, I am not going to object at this time; but it is wrong that a lot of letters addressed to a Senator upon one particular subject—587 of them—should be printed as a public document at Government expense upon a subject that is not even before Congress.

I think, Mr. President, that I have previously said sufficient upon this question; but I say to the Senator from New Jersey that I am not going to object to his request to-day. I am going to be content with simply saying that I have done so in the past, and let other Senators decide whether or not they want the Senate to go into this field of printing. The chairman of the Printing Committee is present, and if he desires the Senate to undertake this kind of printing, well and good. I, however, am opposed to it; it is not right.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. It is the privilege of the Senator from Utah to oppose it. I am quite as much in favor of it as he is opposed to it. I say there is no question that more vitally affects the people of this country than the character of our money. It is very well for the distinguished Senator from Utah to declare that he is opposed to it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I did not say that.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. But there are 587 cashiers and bank presidents all over this country, representing every State in the Union, who declare that the present system is an abuse.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon will state his question of privilege.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I merely wanted to say that I did not feel safe between these two contending factions. [Laughter.]

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. It is all friendly.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to say to the Senator from New Jersey that I do not believe there are 20 per cent of the 587 signers of the letters who have ever seen a washed bill. I want to correct the Senator from New Jersey in the statement that I am opposed to going into this investigation of the question of laundering our currency. I am not opposed to it, as I told the Senator the other day.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I must beg the distinguished Senator's pardon, Mr. President. I did not say that he was opposed to going into the investigation; but it is tantamount to that. The distinguished Senator from Utah sets himself up in opposition to the opinion of 587 bank presidents and cashiers.

Mr. SMOOT. They have not asked that their letters be printed as a public document, and it is to that that I am making opposition.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I confess, Mr. President, they have not asked that the letters be printed, but they have written these letters over their own signatures, and they are of very vital importance, involving, as they do, the question of counterfeiting our money or of facilitating the counterfeiting of our money. Now, I ask, in all seriousness——

Mr. OLIVER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President. What is the order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey has the floor on his request that certain letters be printed as a public document.

Mr. OLIVER. I ask what is the order of procedure, Mr. President? It is, as I understand, the receipt of petitions and memorials.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Petitions and memorials are in order.

Mr. OLIVER. I call for the regular order.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I desire to ask what reason or propriety there is that Senators all around me may flood the Senate with propositions to print papers as public documents while I am denied the privilege? This is not my private concern, but it is a matter that affects the whole people. It is not the special position taken by any particular man, but the letters are from various gentlemen. Now, I concede——

Mr. PENROSE and Mr. OLIVER. Regular order!

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I concede, if our friends all around me should present——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I rise to a point of order, Mr. President. The request for unanimous consent is not subject to debate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; the Chair is compelled to state that the Senator from New Jersey is not in order, and to explain that the other matters have gone through because unanimous consent has been granted. There is objection in this case.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I bow, of course, to the judgment of the Chair; but I will say, Mr. President, if I may be permitted——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection has been made to the Senator proceeding further on this question.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I will reserve to myself the right to read these letters into the RECORD. I am not a very good elocutionist, but I will detain the Senate long enough, if need be, to read them into the RECORD.

PAINT CREEK COAL FIELDS, W. VA.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I have a number of communications in the nature of petitions, referring to the resolution providing for Federal investigation of conditions in the Kanawha coal fields, West Virginia. I have a telegram from the secretary of the Pennsylvania Federation of Labor in convention at Reading, Pa.; one from the international executive board of the United Mine Workers of America, held in Indianapolis May 3; a letter from the president and secretary of Local Union No. 1394, United Mine Workers of America, of West Terre Haute, Ind.; one from C. L. Brumbaugh, editor of the Land and Labor, of Altoona, Pa.; also from the local branch of the Altoona Socialist Party of Pennsylvania; one from the secretary of the Ohio Valley Trades and Labor Assemblies; also from sundry citizens of Raleigh County, W. Va.; a letter from the secretary of the Monongahela Valley Trades and Labor Council of West Virginia; a telegram from the secretary of the Glass Workers' Union, of Kokomo, Ind.; a letter from a committee of Local Union No. 2011, United Mine Workers of America, of Clinton, Ind.; one from sundry citizens of Cabell County, W. Va.; a letter from the secretary of Local Union No. 676, United Mine Workers of America, of Chelyan, W. Va.; one from a committee on resolutions of Montgomery, W. Va.; one from a committee of the Clarksburg Local Window Glass Workers of West Virginia; and one from a committee of Local Union No. 298, United Mine Workers of America, of Richmond, Mo. I have also a letter signed by three men who are in jail at Clarksburg, W. Va., having been tried by a military court-martial. A part of this letter, by permission of the Senate, I will read, as it is short. They say:

We, the undersigned, are victims of the unlawful military despotism. Stripped of our constitutional rights, denied a jury trial, forced to face a drum-head court-martial, deprived of our citizenship, reduced to subjects and thrown in jail, where we have been illegally held prisoners since February 10, 1913, this senatorial investigation is the only ray of hope left the crushed and bleeding citizenship of this State. Again urging you to vigorously push the investigation into the deplorable conditions that are a shame to the State, a disgrace to civilization, and a black blot on the fair name of the Nation, in the name of justice and humanity and for the sake of the outraged manhood and womanhood, we beg you to let nothing stop this investigation and win for yourself the undying thanks and gratitude of a long-suffering and oppressed people.

Very respectfully, yours, the victims of this despotism now in the Harrison County jail held incomunicado.

I do not ask that any of the other communications be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The letter and petitions presented by the Senator from Indiana will lie on the table.

TARIFF DUTY ON SUGAR.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I send to the desk and ask unanimous consent to have read a letter from a good Michigan Democrat. It contains sound Democratic doctrine.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Louisiana sends up a communication and asks unanimous consent that it may be read. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I announced, a little while ago, that I should have to object to the reading of these arguments upon the tariff made by persons who are not Members of the Senate. I feel that I ought to insist upon that with reference to this argument; but as the Senator from Louisiana advises me that if the Secretary does not read it he will insist upon reading it himself, I do not see that I would gain anything by making that objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

LANSING, MICH., May 2, 1913.

HON. JOSEPH E. RANSDELL,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Referring to our conversation concerning the tariff when I was in Washington recently, I beg to submit the following statement of my views on the free-sugar provision of the House tariff bill, and the radical departure from historic Democratic fiscal principles which it emphasizes:

* * * * * * *

Are we to have a new Democratic shibboleth? Is free trade to be inscribed on the party gonfalons which erstwhile bore the immortal watchword of free silver?

And as a logical corollary of this interesting evolution in Democratic slogan making is unquestioning acquiescence in the free-sugar program of the House majority to be the test of loyalty to the Democratic Party?

I am led to ask these questions by the regrettably dogmatic and even intolerant tone assumed by some of the leading congressional supporters of free sugar. As we say out in Michigan, these congressional gentlemen are "as cocky as a bee in a buckwheat field" in declaring that all who do not subscribe to the policy of placing sugar on the free list are accursed and unpardonable apostates to the Democratic faith and chiefly engaged in licking the footsteps of the predatory rich.

It is a singular psychological fact that the word "free" seems to cast an hypnotic spell on a certain order of minds in America. It has a fascinating sound that apparently makes a big hit with a large element both of Democratic doctrinaires and of the party rank and file.

But would free sugar really do more toward satisfying the complaints of the consuming public than free silver would have done in alleviating the country's financial ills 20 years ago?

I know that the majority in Congress are deeply concerned in securing a substantial reduction in the cost of living. Everybody, and especially his wife, knows that this has gone up in many instances by intolerable percentages. It is something that appeals to the business and the bosom, but can anybody be perfectly sure that the proposed enlargement of the free list would make any considerable figure in lightening the burdens of the consumer?

As far as sugar is concerned it is amazing that a tariff duty which produces such a splendid revenue should be the especial bete noir of the congressional free-trade contingent, who—to use an expression which is commonly ignored in polite society—are "hell bent" on lowering the cost of living even if both the standard of American living and the standards of Democracy are also lowered at the same time. And one's amazement grows as one considers that alone of the chief table necessaries of the people sugar can not justly be charged with contributing even in the most negligible degree to the high cost of living. A dollar in money will buy a little more—a day's labor or a given quantity of commodities vastly more—sugar to-day than it would before the general rise in commodity prices began. The present retail price of sugar in Washington is 4½ cents a pound, the lowest in the history of the country. Under free trade sugar might sell for 3½ cents a pound, but the probabilities are that very little of it would ever be sold under 4 cents a pound. A cut of one-half cent a pound in the retail price of sugar would mean a saving to the people of about $35,000,000 annually. But granting that they could buy sugar for 1 cent a pound less than at the present time their saving would be about $70,000,000 annually—a very tidy sum. Against this however, must be set down the loss of $52,000,000 in public revenue and the wiping out of an industry in which over $175,000,000 of American capital is invested, and which has added hundreds of millions of dollars to the agricultural wealth of the country. Viewed from a purely economic standpoint, is the "boon" of free sugar worth all it would cost?

I am very far from admitting in the foregoing that taking the duty off from sugar would actually give us cheaper sugar. The only thing we can be absolutely sure of is that it would destroy the domestic industry, as those engaged in that industry would not dare to take the enormous financial risks involved in the possibility of facing both a bad crop season and a demoralized selling market. With the domestic industry out of the equation, it is easy to see what might happen. There are about 1,000,000 tons of sugar produced now in the United States. The sudden cessation of this production would very likely produce a temporary shortage in the supplies of sugar, and in that event the price of sugar would go soaring. That is precisely what happened in 1911, when there was a partial sugar-crop failure in Cuba and also in the sugar-beet growing countries of continental Europe. It was the marketing of the domestic cane and beet sugar in the late fall of 1911 that sent the price down nearly 2 cents a pound in the course of a few weeks. It is only reasonable to assume that but for this competition the eastern refining interests would have maintained the price of sugar at the exorbitant figure which the people were compelled to pay for it during nearly all the previous summer and fall. Indeed, it would have been in their power to put up the price to a still higher figure. In this instance alone the domestic sugar industry saved the consumers of the country millions of dollars. Is it the part of wisdom now to put sugar on the free list and expose to utter extermination an industry which has vindicated its economic legitimacy (not to say indispensableness) in such a signally effective and impressive manner?

I noticed the other day an interview with the president of one of the principal eastern refining concerns in which he frankly stated that free sugar would undoubtedly have a disastrous effect on the domestic cane and sugar-beet industry. But, curiously enough, he carefully refrained from saying one word about the permanent reduction in the retail price of sugar which we are promised as a result of the free-trade policy which is to sound the death knell of the domestic sugar industry. His silence on this phase of the subject was significant—almost as significant as was his confidently expressed opinion that the passage of the House tariff bill would permanently eliminate the domestic competitive industry.

It seems to me that one of the serious reproaches to be made against the proponents of the House tariff bill is that many of them have not the faintest glimmer of appreciation of the magnitude of their task or of the fateful consequences that are likely to flow from it. It was sagely remarked by Artemus Ward that the trouble with Napoleon was that "he tried to do too much—and did it." There is reason to believe that the Democrats in Congress are attempting a similarly impossible feat, and that they will succeed, with consequences that will be disastrous to the party. In the first place, they are promising the people benefits from their tariff legislation which in all human probability will never be realized. In short, they are proclaiming a deliverance that will not deliver. They are holding out the hope that the radical changes they are planning in the tariff will appreciably, if not greatly, reduce the cost of living, when everybody knows, or should know, that there are economic causes wholly outside the tariff that are operating to keep up the prices of many of the chief necessaries of life. Who, for instance, believes that the wholesale free listing of agricultural products will have any material effect in reducing the prices of the people's food? Will it cut down the prices of beef, flour, eggs, or the various other domestic foodstuffs? Except in a pitifully few instances (and the sugar schedule is one of them) the tariff has afforded no protection whatever to the American agriculturist. The prices of farm products have been steadily rising the world over, and tariff or no tariff they will continue to rise so long as the present disproportion between agricultural production and the growth of population is maintained. How then is it going to be possible to effect a very marked lowering of prices by changes in tariff schedules which bear only the most indirect relation to the primary causes of the present-day increases in the cost of living?

I do not wish to be understood as arguing against the desirability of many of the proposed changes in the agricultural schedules. I am merely calling attention to the futility of exciting popular expectation that they will result in an immediate and decided lessening of the burdens of the consuming masses. If despite the enthusiastic claims of the advocates of drastic tariff reductions it should turn out that no positive or substantial benefits accrue to the vast army of homekeepers in our great urban centers, then indeed would the Democratic Party be compelled to face a desperate situation. And if to the disappointment of the consuming public should be added the unrest and resentment which would follow the unsettlement or destruction of any of our great domestic industries, the plight of the party would assuredly be irremediable. It is well therefore that the Democratic Party should take heed lest in accomplishing its work it accomplishes its ruin.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I should like to inquire how many pages there are of this document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that there are 23 pages in all, of which 7 have been read.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. That is just half the number of pages I had.

Mr. REED. I object to the further reading of it.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, if there is objection to the Secretary reading it, I will finish the reading myself.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Will the Senate consent to the reading of the document?

Mr. REED. I object.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is for the Senate to decide whether or not it shall be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the document be read? [Putting the question.] The "ayes" have it, and the document will be read.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Does not a single objection stop the reading of the document at this time?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It does not, under the rules of the Senate. It has to be submitted to the Senate, and the Senate decides whether or not a document shall be read. The Secretary will resume the reading.

The Secretary read as follows:

It ought to be unnecessary to remind the Democratic majority that it is better to go slowly than to go wrong; that it is better to effect changes moderately and safely rather than hastily and at the dictate of a caucus, too many of whose members leave their private judgments and consciences where the Mussulman leaves his shoes—outside the door. It is a great thing in statesmanship when you are about to inaugurate new departures in governmental policy which may shock some, disturb more, and make hesitating people hesitate still more—it is a great thing in these circumstances, I say, if you can "make the past slide into the future" without any serious jar to the interests chiefly involved. And in doing these things the party which has been intrusted with the task can afford to be generous to those whom it is obliged to disturb.

A little reflection will convince anyone with gumption enough in him to walk on two legs that no Democratic tariff bill, however skillfully framed or however extensive its free list, can express the totality of the party's aspirations and usefulness. It will do mighty well if it shall express only in a measurable degree either the party's economic purposes or the party's capacity to serve the people. Why, then, should a tariff measure, which is inevitably and admittedly the patchwork product of give-and-take committee confabs and dickerings, be set up as the test of fealty to Democracy? To ask the question is to expose the utter absurdity of such a test.

It is particularly irritating to be told that your party loyalty is under suspicion because of your adherence to the doctrine of old-fashioned and unsterilized Democracy that a superb revenue raiser like the sugar tariff should have a prominent place in a genuine tariff-for-revenue program, especially when one sees the House advocates of free trade in sugar voting down all amendments intended to reduce the rates in certain manufacturing schedules, which together produce only a paltry three or four millions of revenue, on the plea that they are needed to furnish an adequate income to the Government! For a parallel to such a fatuous performance we shall have to go back to that "base Indian who threw we pearl away, Richer than all his tribe."

But the Indian really didn't know what he was throwing away, while the House Democrats know exactly the value of the pearl which they are sacrificing in order to justify the retention of a few dinky "off-color" ones!

It can hardly have escaped the notice of the observant portion of the American public that many of those who are now advocating the wholesale free listing of agricultural products were once among the loudest upholders of the claim that the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 would double the prices of farm products and thereby vindicate itself as the most beneficent piece of financial legislation ever proposed by the Democratic Party in the interest of the downtrodden masses. To-day these same infallible Democratic oracles are just as positively assuring us that their free-list program to lower the prices of farm products is an equally indispensable and beneficent pro bono publico stunt, and that all those who do not acclaim it as such will be put out of the pale of the new and expurgated Democracy. Free silver to put up the farmer's prices; free trade to put them down; and both guaranteed as impeccably wise Democratic policies. In view of the awful gee-hawing to which it has been subjected is it any wonder that the poor old Democratic donkey has a calamitous record longer than its proverbial ears?

I have never yet talked with a disinterested Democratic friend of the domestic sugar industry who was not in favor of a substantial reduction of the rates of the present sugar schedule. No one on the Democratic side is opposing a cut that will wipe out any possible excessive profits to either the sugar-beet grower or the sugar-beet manufacturer. Every Democratic argument in favor of reducing instead of entirely removing the duty on sugar is based upon the proposition that a tariff duty which approximates so closely to the historic Democratic ideal of a tariff for revenue should not be cut to a point where it would inevitably destroy an industry dependent upon the incidental—or direct, if you please—protection which it affords. To adopt a policy which absolutely contravenes this proposition is not only to flout one of the most firmly established of Democratic traditions, but would indubitably invite Democratic division and ultimate party disaster. It can not be fitly characterized otherwise than as a reversal of our economic and fiscal policy as wanton and upsetting as a Central American revolution.

I know it is often asserted that the Democratic Party is "pledged" to abandon its traditional policy—a policy, by the way, that has been adopted even by free-trade England—of treating sugar as a legitimate object of tariff-for-revenue taxation and to put it on the free list; but who "pledged" the party to do these things?

I am somewhat familiar with the history of the Democratic Party, but I do not recall a single name in its long roll of seers, prophets, and statesmen which stands as sponsor for such a pledge. Certainly Thomas Jefferson was not its sponsor, for it was during his administration that sugar was made a headliner on the dutiable list. Neither was Madison, or Monroe, or Jackson, or Van Buren, or Cass, or Douglas, or Seymour, or Tilden, or Randall, or "Horizontal Bill" Morrison. Grover Cleveland was regarded as a pretty advanced tariff reformer, but he favored the retention of a duty of approximately 1 cent a pound on sugar, although in his day Louisiana was the only sugar-producing State in the Union.

The fact is that, beginning with the founding of the Democratic Party, the "pledge" of free sugar is not heard of until we come down to the halcyon and vociferous time when the militant free-trade coterie in the last House became the adoration and the hope of the long-suffering Democratic masses. The "fathers" were all tariff-for-revenue Democrats—not free traders. They believed with John G. Carlisle, who was one of the ablest students of economics of his day, that the sugar duty is one of the most legitimate and equitable import taxes ever levied. This belief has also been convincingly avowed by such eminent modern Democratic philosophers and guides as Senator JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS and Col. George Harvey, the editor of Harper's Weekly and the "mutual friend" and discriminating admirer of Woodrow Wilson and Col. Henry Watterson. It is clearly apparent, therefore, that the so-called sugar reactionaries are in fairly respectable Democratic company.

And right here I wish to call attention to the fact that neither in his campaign for the Democratic presidential nomination nor for the election did Mr. Wilson pledge himself to give the country free sugar. On the contrary, whenever he was asked about his position on the sugar tariff he distinctly declared that he was against any tariff changes that would injure or destroy any legitimate industry. Is it anywhere seriously contended that the beet-sugar industry is not a legitimate domestic industry? Does anyone pretend that it is not as indigenous and legitimate an industry in many sections of the great temperate zone of the United States as it is in Germany or France or Austria-Hungary or Russia? More than 35,000 farmers are engaged in beet-sugar growing in Michigan alone, and they are finding it the most profitable crop they can raise. It has been the greatest promoter of scientific and intensive methods of farming of any crop ever introduced into the State. So far as its economic legitimacy is concerned, its status is absolutely fixed and unchallengeable, which is more than can be said of the legitimacy of the effort that is now being made to set up free sugar as the sine qua non of the Democratic tariff-reform program.

The proponents of free sugar have not even the excuse of "curbing" any domestic monopoly to justify their revolutionary proposal. No one is foolish enough to claim that even the present sugar schedule affords the slightest shelter to any oppressive combination. Indeed, it is only since the development of the beet-sugar industry that competitive conditions in the sugar trade have been established in this country. Before that time the powerful Havemeyer-Arbuckle-Spreckels refining interests had absolute control of the American sugar market; to-day throughout the great Middle West and the West they have to meet the competition of the domestic beet-sugar producers. The one certain effect of free sugar would be to give these interests complete control again of the American market, for 2-cent Cuban or Javan raw sugar would enable them to put out of business every domestic producer of this great staple. Thus instead of legislating to destroy monopoly the Democratic majority in the House would actually restore it. That is why all the big refining interests are lined up for free sugar. It is possible there would be times under a free-trade régime when the people would pay a slightly lower price for their sugar, but would even this be an adequate compensation for the annihilation of one of the most valuable and prosperous of our western agricultural interests and the involvement of the planters of Louisiana in general bankruptcy?

It is a point of curious interest that some of the stoutest defenders of the free-list provisions in the House bill delight to speak of that measure as establishing a "competitive tariff" policy. This is a clever euphemism. But does it "square with the actual facts," which Mr. Wilson said in his message the new tariff schedules should do? So far as the sugar schedule is concerned, it isn't a "competitive tariff" at all; it is a confiscatory tariff. At the expiration of three years it subjects the domestic sugar industry not to competitive conditions under moderate tariff duties but to competitive conditions under a reign of absolute free trade. This means that at the end of three years the industry will be left in a situation where it must either be run at a loss or go out of existence, because there is not a single beet or cane sugar concern in the country that can make a penny of profit with Cuban raw sugar selling in the New York market around 2 cents a pound.

This is not mere pessimistic persiflage or idle guesswork. It is a statement that is substantiated by incontrovertible facts. In Michigan the beet-sugar mills pay the farmer an average price of $2.80 for each hundredweight of the extractable sugar in his beets. That is to say, the cost of the sugar content of Michigan beets before the process of manufacture begins is 80 cents more per hundredweight than the price at which the eastern refiners would be able under free trade to buy an equal amount of Cuban raw sugar at the seaboard. It is idle to suppose that any increased "efficiency" of factory management could in the short space of three years overcome this handicap. Is it a "competitive" or a confiscatory tariff policy that would deprive the domestic sugar producers of the right to live?

It is a grave responsibility which men assume when they deal with the fortunes of great communities. It is altogether too grave a responsibility for men with a predilection for radical courses and who insist that all the large relativities and adjustments of our complex economic life shall fall dead on the congressional caucus doormat. A great English publicist once warned against "the falsehood of extremes." It is well to repeat this warning for the benefit of men who apparently have yet to learn that no political creed or economic prejudice should be allowed to obscure the truth that in the art of government all principles are relative, not absolute, and that a rigid insistence upon them under any and all circumstances is the mark of inferior statesmanship.

I am thoroughly persuaded that if the broad and enlightened recommendations contained in the President's message should be carried out there would be no cause either for criticism or alarm in any quarter. It is true that these recommendations partake largely of the nature of generalities, but they are generalities that breathe the spirit of true statesmanly wisdom and admonition. He distinctly advised against "cutting at the roots of what has grown up among us by long processes and at our own invitation." If this language does not convey a positive rebuke to those who would put sugar upon the free list regardless of the damaging effects which such a policy would have upon the domestic industry, then the President was most inept in the choice of his words. I do not believe that he went astray in that regard or that he intended to use words in a double sense. He is incapable of doing either of these things. He meant exactly what his language says. He is against "cutting at the roots" of any industry which, like the beet-sugar industry, has grown up among us "at our own invitation," even though it can not be said to have passed through "long processes," owing to its comparatively recent establishment in this country. It can be confidently affirmed that if any industry was ever established in the United States "at our invitation," beet sugar was that industry. It is not only had the invitation extended to it by the National Government through its Agricultural Bureau and its traditional tariff policy, but it had in many instances the more alluring invitation offered it by direct State bounties. It exists to-day upon the strength of the Government's express invitation, and that invitation can not be withdrawn without leaving a stain upon the national honor. It seems to me that it is far more important that the Government should fulfill its pledge to keep that "invitation" good than that the Democratic majority should carry out the "pledge" of the free-trade contingent in Congress to give the country a "boon" which only the rich sugar-refining interests (the real Sugar Trust) are clamoring for.

I wish to disclaim any purpose to oppose the President's general tariff policy. In the main I think he is absolutely right in his conception of what a Democratic tariff bill should be. His statement of the general considerations which should control in the framing of it was certainly unexceptionable. He has had the fairness to admit that the effect of putting sugar on the free list at once would be disastrous to the domestic industry, and it was through his personal influence, seconded by the efforts of House Leader UNDERWOOD, that the date for giving effect to this ultrainnovatory provision of the House tariff bill was postponed three years. Now, I respectfully submit that a wiser course would be to make an immediate 25 per cent cut in the duty, but continue it indefinitely as the most productive and the least burdensome of Federal import taxes. In the meantime a special expert commission should be appointed to investigate the economic status of the domestic industry in order that its findings may furnish a scientific basis for future readjustments of the sugar schedule.

Notwithstanding I may be set down as a "sugar reactionary," I wish to say that I have the most implicit faith not only in the patriotic intentions, but the exceptional statesmanly capabilities and prescience of Mr. Wilson. I was an humble but very ardent supporter of his candidacy for the Democratic presidential nomination. I am happy to say that in most respects his course, both as a candidate and as President, has met with my unqualified approval. Nobody but a man of the highest political ideals and the truest moral inspiration could speak as he almost invariably speaks. His addresses are characterized by a certain intellectual nobleness and catholic breadth of view that easily rank them among the most impressive public utterances of our time, if not of any time. In my opinion he possesses every essential attribute of statesmanly greatness except infallibility; every natural prerogative of political leadership except the power to convert an academic sentiment into a fixed party policy. And to do him justice I do not believe that he preens himself on any omniscient qualities. But there is imminent danger that in his almost hilarious enthusiasm for Democratic ideals he will try "to do too much."

I am profoundly anxious that the President should prove himself to be as accomplished a maker of history as he is a writer of it. His familiarity with American public affairs is remarkable. And this leads me to remark that no man of our time knows any better than he does that the Democratic Party is not a free-trade party and that it has never made any "pledge" to enact free-trade legislation, either by piecemeal or in toto, that would imperil our national industrial independence. No Democratic leader, excepting possibly National Chairman McCombs, has ever been more emphatic in disavowing on his own behalf and that of his party such a "pledge" than Mr. Wilson was in the late campaign. So desirous was he to have his own and the party's attitude on this subject clearly understood by the country that he dictated this declaration in the tariff plank of the Baltimore convention:

"We favor the ultimate attainment of the principles we advocate by legislation that will not injure or destroy any legitimate domestic industry."

Such was the pledge upon which the Democratic Party made its appeal to the voters, and I submit that it is the law which should govern Democratic legislation until further action by the national convention and an appeal to the people have sanctioned a different rule of action. It was upon the strength of this pledge, aided and abetted by the militant G. O. P. majority smashing Bull Moosers, that the party was intrusted with power. It ought to be incredible that any Democrat should now seriously propose to ignore that pledge in the case of sugar and the agricultural schedules. The fate which overtook the Taft administration as a result of its well-meant endeavors to provide by reciprocal arrangement for free trade in farm products with Canada should serve as an impressive warning to those who would extend that free-trade arrangement to include the whole world without even stipulating for or receiving any reciprocal benefits whatsoever.

The statesman or the party leader who, in formulating important legislative measures, does not take into consideration the psychological effect as well as the ultimate practical results of those measures is a raw hand at the business. I refuse to believe that the President is that sort of an immature leader. I refuse to believe that he will commit his party to radical courses which—however sound theoretically—are calculated to alarm and alienate large numbers of voters in many of the most populous and progressive agricultural sections of the country. And I especially and emphatically refuse to believe that he will insist on a course which so directly contravenes the historic Democratic doctrine of a tariff for revenue, and which so palpably violates both his own and his party's pledges as that involved in the House proposal to entirely remove the duty on sugar, which not only yields a princely revenue but makes it possible for a great domestic industry to live and to render the country the inestimable economic service of preserving it from becoming wholly dependent upon outside sources for its supplies of one of the chief necessaries of life.

"I don't know what you call this," said a famous prime minister of a certain bill laid before the British Cabinet, "but it ought to be named a bill to knock out this Government." Despite the fact that no Democrat of prominence in Congress has yet consented to even putatively father the new tariff bill by giving it his name, let us not be in a hurry to apply to it such a name as that proposed by the free-spoken British premier. There assuredly must be some Democrats in the Senate with his capacity for "sizing up" legislative boomerangs and who will not take any chances of having their party knocked out by one of them.

Respectfully, etc.,

LOUIS E. ROWLEY.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, just a moment. The paper which we have heard read is clearly nothing more than a brief on the part of those who are opposed to any reduction of the rates upon sugar; and it hardly ought to be dignified with the name of "a brief." It is more in the nature of a stump speech, which has now in effect been delivered to the Senate of the United States by a person who is not a member of this body. It has up to the present consumed nearly an hour's time and taken up nearly all the morning hour of the Senate.

There are, Mr. President, in the possession of members of the Finance Committee, I have no doubt, two or three hundred briefs upon the tariff; and, if this practice is to continue, any member of that committee, or any Senator who might get into his possession one of the briefs now in possession of members of the committee, might have them read here before the Senate, and the morning hour be taken up with hearing arguments from briefs made in behalf of persons who are opposed to the reduction of the tariff. It is easy to see how readily this courtesy may be abused, and I want to announce now, Mr. President, in the interest of the saving of time, to cut off this apparent, this evident, abuse that hereafter I shall object to the reading of these briefs. If Senators desire to read them, I suppose, under the rule, possibly that may be their privilege, provided they get the floor when there is something before the body.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the Senator from North Carolina must have overlooked the fact that in accordance with the provisions of Rule XI this matter was submitted to the Senate, and the Senate ordered the document read.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not complaining of that. I am simply calling attention to the fact that it is a document which is in the nature of a brief; that it has occupied an hour of our time; that there are four or five hundred other briefs now in the possession of Senators that might also be read if Senators saw fit to ask the time of the Senate for their reading; and I shall do everything in my power to prevent this abuse of the privileges of the Senate and taking up unnecessarily the morning hour.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I do not think that I have violated any of the proprieties of the Senate in having this document read. It did not consume an hour; it consumed but 30 minutes—just half an hour—so far as that is concerned.

There may be several hundred briefs like this in the files of the Committee on Finance, but I know nothing about them. We have certainly had no public hearings. My people have been demanding public hearings and are still demanding public hearings on this great measure, which is going to destroy the greatest industry in my State. It may be a simple matter for some gentlemen to pass legislation of this kind, but it is a serious matter for the people of Louisiana. I, as their representative here, am obliged to do what I can to safeguard their interests.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President——

Mr. RANSDELL. I decline to yield for the moment.

This paper, in my judgment, presents good, sound Democratic doctrine; it is the effusion of a Michigan Democrat; it embodies the views of a Wilson Democrat, a man who did everything he could to have Mr. Wilson nominated and elected, and I think every Democrat here should read and ponder carefully every word that is contained in this letter. He will get some good thoughts from it.

The Senator from North Carolina may have read the various and sundry hundred and odd briefs that he has on the sugar question. If he has done so, it seems he is more than mortal in his capacity for work. I can not read all of these things. This document struck me as a wonderfully good one. Therefore I had it read, and I indorse every word of it on my responsibility as a Senator.

Mr. JAMES. I desire to ask the Senator from Louisiana a question before he takes his seat. He says the people of Louisiana are clamoring for hearings upon this sugar schedule. Is it not true that they had hearings in the other House? The Senator himself was present; I am sure I saw the Member of the House who is in future to be the Senator's colleague present; and I am certain that they had hearings upon the question of sugar, thorough and complete.

Mr. RANSDELL. Yes, sir; they had hearings in the House, "thorough and complete," I presume, in the opinion of the Senator from Kentucky. Forty-five minutes were accorded to the Louisiana people to discuss an industry which has carried a duty since 1789; which has never been in all the history of this Republic without a duty, except when it received a bounty of 2 cents a pound, and when we had——

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President——

Mr. RANSDELL. Pardon me; allow me to answer you. When we went before the Ways and Means Committee of the House we had several men there, and only one of them was allowed to talk. He talked for 45 minutes—the pitiful time of 45 minutes. That sugar hearing, sir, occupied four hours, as I recall, and one-half of the time was given to Mr. Lowry, who has been persistently, in season and out of season, fighting for free sugar for two or three years. He controlled half the time, and occupied it in arguments in favor of free sugar, and all the Louisiana people could get was 45 minutes. That may be ample time, but I do not think so. I would have liked to talk 45 minutes myself, and the distinguished gentleman, a Member of the other House, Mr. BROUSSARD, who understands this question probably as well or better than any other man in Congress, would have been glad to speak an hour or more. The only time given us was that brief period; and we allowed Mr. Robert Milling, a lawyer from Louisiana, who was thoroughly posted, to occupy it, knowing we could not divide our forces and make any kind of a showing in that length of time.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, I will say, in reply to the Senator's speech, that the Ways and Means Committee gave several hours to a hearing upon the question of free sugar. In addition to that, the questioning and the cross-examination of witnesses took several hours in addition, and all of the gentlemen who appeared there were permitted to file briefs upon the sugar question, which are now embraced in the hearings of the Ways and Means Committee. In addition to that, the Hardwick committee for almost one year of time heard witnesses upon almost every phase of the sugar question. The report of that committee covers about six volumes, as I recall, or more than 4,000 pages, upon the question of the wages, the cost of producing sugar, the price of sugar abroad and at home, and every ramification of the sugar question. I have no hesitancy in saying that the testimony that has been taken on sugar by the Ways and Means Committee and the briefs filed before that committee and the Hardwick hearings upon the question of sugar are so extensive that it would take the Senator almost three months' time of constant labor to read and digest the evidence already presented. I have no doubt that certain interests in this country that already are having the favor of the Government in the way of taxation showered upon them are willing to have investigations—interminable investigations, exhaustive investigations—that will go further to exhaust the consumers who have to pay the taxes they are gathering from the people—for the tax they gather will be undisturbed so long as you only "investigate"—than they will be exhaustive in finding the cost of production and the wages paid.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, just a word more. I will not take the time of the Senate very long. We had, I think, as I have said, four hours' hearings in the House. I will not rehash that; but I will reiterate—and it will be borne out by the record, if any one seeks to investigate it—my statement that the representatives from Louisiana were given only 45 minutes and that was not sufficient time to discuss the subject.

It is true that there were hearings on the cost of sugar in the Hardwick examination. I think three gentlemen from Louisiana came up here and were questioned in regard to it; but it was not a very friendly committee. It was a committee organized principally to find against us, and they found against us. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. JAMES. Why, Mr. President, I dissent most respectfully from that statement. I do not believe the Senator from Louisiana wants to charge the distinguished Speaker of the House of Representatives with packing a committee to make a finding against a special interest in this country, and I will ask the Senator——

Mr. RANSDELL. I did not mean that at all.

Mr. JAMES. Just a moment—if it is not true that that committee was organized to find out whether there was a sugar trust controlling the price of sugar in this country?

Mr. RANSDELL. I believe that was the purpose; but I believe the committee was unfriendly to sugar.

Mr. JAMES. Oh, the Senator may say that every man is unfriendly to sugar who does not believe in taxing all the people of the United States to keep alive an industry that is not self-sustaining.

Mr. RANSDELL. There is a Sugar Trust now, Mr. President, and that Sugar Trust has been trying very hard to get free sugar, or else I am badly fooled. Mr. Spreckels testified before the Hardwick committee that he had put up, or his company had put up, $12,000 to spread through his agent, Mr. Lowry, the doctrine of free sugar. He admitted that in the testimony before Mr. HARDWICK'S committee. Everyone who has been in Congress for several years knows that he has received a great many little yellow documents emanating from Mr. Lowry's bureau; he knows that he has received from home people these little yellow slips of paper, with the names of his constituents signed to them. Who sent them to the home people? This same Mr. Lowry, incited thereto by one of the sugar trusts. I do not know how many trusts there are; but certainly Mr. Lowry's company is one of the big refiners, and certainly Mr. Lowry's company is one that is going to be a beneficiary if the competition resulting from the beet-sugar manufacture of this country is destroyed.

Who will profit by it more than the refiners? What causes the low price of sugar now? First, the very large supply there is in the world, and, second, the very active competition of the beet-sugar people. The testimony before Mr. HARDWICK'S committee showed that fact, and every man who has investigated it is obliged to admit that fact.

Now, Mr. President, I do not want to take up too much time of the Senate, but just this further remark and I am through. The Senator from Kentucky says that we have had long hearings. We had just 45 minutes before the Ways and Means Committee.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. RANSDELL. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. When the Senator answers the statement of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], I want to ask him if he is aware of the fact that during the year 1912 the Finance Committee of the Senate gave hearings upon the sugar schedule? I want to say to the Senator, if he does not know that fact, that it was one of the three schedules that the Finance Committee most exhaustively investigated; and that fact will be shown by the circumstance that the testimony taken by the Finance Committee last year on the question of sugar covered 901 pages of printed matter. I do not think there was a phase of this question that was not gone into. I do not remember exactly how long the investigation lasted, but I think it lasted several weeks, and everybody representing any phase of the sugar interest who desired to be heard upon that subject, even to machinery—there being pending before the Senate at that time the House schedule bill revising the sugar schedule—was given full opportunity to be heard. I will state to the Senator that there was absolutely no limitation placed upon the time that representatives of that industry were allowed to speak or that representatives of that industry were allowed to testify, and when they got through they were permitted to file all the briefs they desired.

There has been no change, Mr. President, in this situation since 1912, when we held the investigations. I think they were held about the middle of the summer of 1912, and the hearings before the House committee of this year cover 231 pages. So that the hearings upon this schedule within the last year have been so exhaustive that it has required 1,132 pages to cover the testimony.

Mr. STONE. And it has all been printed?

Mr. SIMMONS. It has all been printed, and every Senator has an opportunity to read what has been said.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, that may be true; I do not know. But when a man is going to be put to death he is usually allowed to have a last word. We accord that privilege even to the condemned criminal on the gallows. The great party of which I am an humble member is about to put to death the greatest industry in my State, and we want a chance to be heard. My people are demanding that they be heard.

Perhaps they have been listened to in the past, but they want to be heard again. Is there anyone here who will deny that the passage of this bill in its present form will destroy the sugar industry in Louisiana? Is there anyone here who will deny that that industry has existed for over 100 years? Is there anyone here who will say it is not a legitimate industry? Is there anyone here who will say that the Democratic Party demands in its platform or in its principles that legitimate industries be destroyed? Is there anyone here who will say that sugar is not the best revenue producer we have? All of these things that I state are facts.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. RANSDELL. Certainly.

Mr. MYERS. I should like to ask my friend, the Senator from Louisiana, if this industry has been protected for 100 years and is still an infant industry that needs protection, how long it will take it to become a matured industry and to be grown so that it will not need protection as an infant?

Mr. RANSDELL. I can not answer that question, and I shall not attempt to do so. I may say it is not original with the Senator from Montana. It has been asked by a great many people a great many times in the past.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I should like to ask another question. Has my first question ever been answered?

Mr. RANSDELL. Will the Senator please let me answer this question as well as I can? I will state that whether the industry be an infant or not there is a great deal of money invested in sugar in Louisiana. There are fully half a million people down there who are interested in the industry and more or less dependent upon it. There are a great many people there who have made their investments upon the faith of the policies and the principles of the Democratic Party from its very foundation to the present day.

Mr. REED rose.

Mr. RANSDELL. I decline to be interrupted for a moment. We have been, in good faith, making our investments. Now, let me show you how some of them are situated at this moment.

I hold in my hand a letter from Houma, La., dated May 8, 1913, and addressed to me. It is as follows:

THE HOME INSURANCE CO., NEW YORK,
Houma, La., May 8, 1913.

Hon. JOSEPH E. RANSDELL, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Inclosed please find a letter from the Security Insurance Co., of New Haven, Conn., which might be of some little help to you in your fight for sugar, as it shows the far-reaching effects of the Underwood tariff bill, in that this risk a few months ago would have been gladly taken by almost any insurance company.

Hoping that this may be of some service to you, I am,
Yours, truly,

STANWOOD DUVAL, Agent.

This is a very short letter, just a page and a half. I will read it now. It is from the Security Insurance Co., of New Haven, Conn., and is dated April 25, 1913:

THE SECURITY INSURANCE CO., OF NEW HAVEN, CONN., SOUTHWESTERN DEPARTMENT,
Dallas, Tex., April 25, 1913.

DUVAL INSURANCE AGENCY, Houma, La.

GENTLEMEN: In view of the fact that Congress will soon pass a tariff bill affecting the sugar interests, and the statement of Chairman UNDERWOOD that the production of sugar in the United States can not be carried on under the new tariff, we have decided to discontinue entirely the insurance on sugar houses. Furthermore, we believe the conditions are so serious that we should be relieved of liability at once of all risks of that character on our books now. We find we have the following policy issued from your agency, 71747—Argyle Planting &

Manufacturing Co.—and ask that you kindly cancel and return the same to this office at once. If you have not sufficient funds in your possession to pay the return premiums, we shall be very glad to send you a check to cover.

Please do not delay this matter, as we regard it very serious. I am quite sure you will agree with me that the interest of the company demands such action on our part. The insurance business is one of great hazards; and a well-managed company, which after all is the best asset an agent can have, should take advantage of every proposition of this nature and protect its interest.

Yours, very truly,

T. A. MANNING, General Agent.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. RANSDELL. I shall have to yield first to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. Then I will yield to the Senator from Kentucky. The Senator from Missouri was the first one who asked a question.

Mr. REED. I understood the Senator to say there were half a million people interested in sugar in his State.

Mr. RANSDELL. I stated that there were that many interested directly or indirectly.

Mr. REED. Is it not a fact that there are in the Senator's State less than 1,500 sugar planters, great and small? And is it not a further fact that the vast majority of the sugar lands in acreage are controlled by less than 100 people?

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I do not live in the sugar portion of Louisiana. My home is in the extreme northeast corner of the State, in the cotton section. I suppose I live at least 200 miles from the sugar section. For 14 years I represented in Congress a great cotton district of the State. Very few of my personal friends, except those I know politically, live down in the sugar section. We have not down there the magnificent transportation facilities that there are in some of the States, and I have not had occasion personally to visit often the sugar section of my State. But I am assured by my colleague, Mr. BROUSSARD, a Member of the House of Representatives, that there are more than 3,000 sugar planters in his own parish of Iberia.

The Senator is entirely mistaken when he speaks about there being only 1,500 planters in the State, all told. There are not a very great many of the real large planters. But there are thousands and thousands of farmers who raise sugar in a small way on their small farms and sell their tonnage to the big factories on the large plantations, just as the beet grower of the West raises beets on his small acreage and sells it to the large factories.

I presume the Senator from Missouri, by his question, intends to call in question the correctness of my statement about there being half a million people interested in the industry or more or less dependent on it. New Orleans is a city of about 360,000 people. New Orleans is to a very great extent dependent upon the sugar industry—far more dependent upon that than anything else, though it handles a considerable amount of lumber, cotton, rice, and so forth. A number of the fairest and richest parishes in the State south of Red River and west of the Atchafalaya River, all through the beautiful Teche region immortalized by Longfellow in his famous poem, Evangeline, are devoted to sugar. I think I am well within bounds when I say that more than one-third of the people of Louisiana are dependent, directly or indirectly, upon sugar, though I do not pretend to intimate that one-third of them are engaged in raising sugar. We have something like 1,600,000 people in the State.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. RANSDELL. I do.

Mr. REED. I am simply trying to get these matters boiled down into concrete facts, as far as possible. I understand the Senator's statement now. He did not mean that there are half a million people engaged in the sugar business in his State.

Mr. RANSDELL. Oh, not at all. I did not say that.

Mr. REED. He meant that there were half a million people in the State of Louisiana who would be affected by a reduction of the sugar tariff, in this way—that he thinks it would injure the State generally, and thus would injure them.

Mr. RANSDELL. No; it would injure every man in the State generally—cut off our State taxes, our school taxes, our road taxes, our levee taxes, and everything of that kind in a general way—by reducing enormously the assessed value of the State's property.

Mr. REED. Can the Senator give us an idea as to how many acres actually are used for the raising of sugar in Louisiana?

Mr. RANSDELL. I do not believe I can answer that question at present. I had no idea I would be called upon to make a speech here to-day. I will go into that matter very fully later and enlighten the Senate just as thoroughly as I can on it. I know, in round numbers, that we have $100,000,000 invested in the sugar business in Louisiana. Some of that is in land; some of it, of course, is in machinery; some of it is in mules; some of it, and a very large part, is in great sugar factories—$35,000,000 to $40,000,000. They would be absolutely destroyed. I will attempt to give full details on all of that at some future time.

Mr. REED. I trust the Senator will. He has spoken about the large number of men engaged in raising sugar. I understand, of course, that there are a large number of men engaged in raising sugar if you count as a sugar planter the colored brother who raises a half acre somewhere and also raises other things. But I ask the Senator, when he makes his investigation and gives us his figures, if he will not tell us the number of real sugar planters there are, counting as a sugar planter a man who is engaged in the business extensively enough so that he can be called a sugar raiser. I trust we will have that information. I am not asking this to interrupt the Senator; but he comes from that State, and I should like to have some accurate information about it.

Mr. RANSDELL. Will the Senator himself permit a question?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. RANSDELL. In order that I may answer intelligently—and I assure the Senator I will try to do so—I should like him to define planters. I will say, in passing, that there are a great many white farmers all over southern Louisiana who do not have very large holdings, but they own their homes. They are people of Acadian ancestry. They live on very small places, and as their children grow up they divide their places among them. They are people who under no circumstances will sell their homes. They are as good people as there are on God's hemisphere. They are not large planters in the sense that they own hundreds of acres, but they are Caucasians; they are good American citizens; they are farmers. They practice, to a certain extent, intensive farming. If you are going to eliminate all that class of white people and bring it down to men who own 2,000 and more acres, I can not name a very large number to the Senator; and I ask him to define what he means.

Mr. REED. It would be a little difficult to draw a hard and fast line; but manifestly there is a difference between a man who is raising sugar and is a sugar planter and a man who is raising cotton and corn and has a little patch of sugar that is a mere incident to his farming business.

I suggest to the Senator, as he is directly interested and is appealing to this side for aid and sympathy and may get some, that he give us the total number of acres and give us the total number of planters who raise over 100 acres. Then we can very easily find out the number of other people who will be affected—those who have only an acre or two. That information I have tried to get, in a rather hurried way, from some of the departments, and I have failed to get anything that is satisfactory. I thought the Senator could give it to us, and I am sure he will if the information is available.

Mr. RANSDELL. I will endeavor to comply with the request of the Senator from Missouri; but I shall also have to give the acreage of the smaller farmers, as well as those who have upward of 100 acres. I presume the Senator will not object to that at all.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. RANSDELL. I must yield next to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]. Then I will yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I was just going to ask a question of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. RANSDELL. The Senator from Utah wishes to ask the Senator from Missouri a question.

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator to modify his request, because of the fact that there are very, very few farmers in the United States who have 100 acres in beets.

Mr. REED. I was only speaking about cane.

Mr. SMOOT. I know in my State of hundreds of men who have not over 5 acres, and they could not attend to more than 5 acres. Upon that 5 acres they make a living. It is intensified farming. I ask the Senator to change his request and call for the entire acreage.

Mr. REED. My request was directed to the Senator from Louisiana, and had reference alone to his own State and to the cane-sugar industry. It had no reference to the beet-sugar industry.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. REED. I wanted to get at the situation in Louisiana. For my part, I can say now to the Senator from Utah that as far as the man is concerned who owns 300 or 400 acres of land and only sees fit to put 4 or 5 acres into beets, I am not in favor of taxing all the people of the United States so that he can still have that 5 acres of beets.

Mr. SMOOT. No such thing exists in the West at all, Mr. President. We do not have 300 or 400 acres of land there in the hands of one man. We believe in intensified cultivation.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, the Senator from Louisiana stated that the Democratic Party had done nothing which his people could construe as being in favor of free sugar, or had taken no action that would have advised his people in advance that if the Democratic Party obtained control we would place sugar upon the free list. Is it not true that the Democratic House of Representatives last year placed sugar upon the free list?

Mr. RANSDELL. It is.

Mr. JAMES. And is it not true that the Democratic national platform of 1912 specifically indorsed that action?

Mr. RANSDELL. No.

Mr. JAMES. Did it not do it in these words——

Mr. RANSDELL. Read the words.

Mr. JAMES. I have them here:

At this time, when the Republican Party, after a generation of unlimited power in its control of the Federal Government, is rent into factions, it is opportune to point to the record of accomplishment of the Democratic House of Representatives in the Sixty-second Congress. We indorse its action, and we challenge comparison of its record with that of any Congress which has been controlled by our opponents.

"We indorse its action," says the Democratic platform. What was its action? Passing various tariff bills, chief among which was a free-sugar bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will ask the Senator from Louisiana to suspend. The morning hour has almost expired and the Chair desires to hand down certain bills from the House of Representatives.

Mr. RANSDELL. That will not cut me off from replying later, or to-morrow, or at the next meeting of the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. At any time when the Senator obtains the floor. The Chair simply asks this as a courtesy, as the morning hour has almost expired.

Mr. WEEKS. I introduce a bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bill will be considered read twice by its title and appropriately referred.

Mr. JONES. Are bills being referred without reading them by title?

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there is objection, it can not be done; but the Chair stated that without objection it would be done.

Mr. JONES. I object to the reference of a bill without the title being read.

Mr. JAMES. The objection comes too late, as to those which have been introduced.

Mr. JONES. I hardly think that. I have never in the Senate known bills of a general character referred without reading the titles. I did not know that the request was being submitted. I do not care to have the titles of private bills read. Pension bills, I think, ought to be handed in without the titles being read, but I think the titles of bills of a general nature should be read.

Mr. SMOOT. The titles of private-claims bills need not be read.

Mr. JONES. Not of private-claims bills. They can be handed to the Secretary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The trouble is that the Chair does not know the character of a bill until the title has been read.

Mr. JONES. I understand that.

THE TARIFF.

Mr. OLIVER submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 3321) to reduce tariff duties and provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes, which were referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

CLAIMS OF MARY L. ADAIR AND OTHERS.

Mr. OLIVER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 83), which was read and referred to the Committee on Claims:

Resolved, That the claims of Mary L. Adair and others, contained in S. 1904, now pending in the Senate, together with all accompanying papers, be, and the same are hereby, referred to the Court of Claims, in pursuance of the provisions of an act entitled "An act to provide for the bringing of suits against the Government of the United States," approved March 3, 1887, and generally known as the Tucker Act. And the said court shall proceed with the same in accordance with the provisions of such act and report to the Senate in accordance therewith.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I submit a resolution and ask that it be read for the information of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Rules.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 84), as follows:

Resolved, That the rules of the Senate be amended as follows: Rule XII, clause 1, after the words "by the Senate," there shall be inserted the following: "and any Senator may arise and declare that he is paired and how he would vote if not paired, and may add that being present he desires to be so recorded in order to constitute a quorum; whereupon he shall be so recorded and his presence as a part of the quorum announced by the Chair."

The VICE PRESIDENT. May the Chair inquire of the Senator from Mississippi whether notice was given on yesterday of this proposed amendment of the rules?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No, sir; it was not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment, then, will go over one day.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, referring to the resolution submitted by the Senator from Mississippi, it seems to me that under the rules—I am not stating this by way of making any objection to its consideration——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have not asked for its consideration.

Mr. BACON. But under the rules it is required that the Senator shall give notice of his intention to submit a proposed amendment of the rules, and that he has not done. The rule requires that a Senator give a day's notice of an intention to submit a resolution proposing to amend the rules and that he should particularly specify the rule intended to be amended. I simply suggest that in order that the Senate may be put in possession——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, my request was that the matter be referred to the Committee on Rules. In order to avoid any difficulty, I give notice of my intention upon to-morrow, or upon the next legislative day, to introduce the resolution and request its reference to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. BACON. That has to be in writing, and has to specify the rule sought to be amended.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It does specify the rule sought to be amended, and the clause.

Mr. BACON. The notice of the intention to introduce the resolution has to be in writing. That is what I am referring to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah will state it.

Mr. SMOOT. I may have misunderstood the Senator from Mississippi; but in offering the resolution I thought the Senator asked that it be referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did.

Mr. SMOOT. That is all there is to it, then. If he had not done so, the objection of the Senator from Georgia would be perfectly in order.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, even if it is referred it is offered as a resolution in the Senate. I am not speaking as to the merits of the matter at all. I am speaking about what the rule requires should be done if it is sought to amend the rules of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state, for the benefit of the Senator from Georgia, that the Chair made an inquiry of the Senator from Mississippi, in order that the RECORD might be properly made up. After the Senator said that he had not given notice on yesterday, the Chair announced that the matter must lie over one day and be treated as though it were simply a proposition to amend. The RECORD will at least show that the Senator gives notice of his intention to submit an amendment to the rules. Whether that has to be in writing or not, the Chair has not as yet ruled, but assumes that the Senator from Mississippi will put his notice in writing. In fact, the Chair understands he is now doing so.

Mr. BACON. That is all right.

Mr. WILLIAMS subsequently said: Mr. President, I send to the desk a written notice of a proposed amendment of the rules.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The notice will be entered. The morning hour has expired, and the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

ARMOR PLATE FOR VESSELS OF THE NAVY.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the discussion of the tariff during the last three or four mornings has prevented much morning business. Some days ago I submitted Senate resolution 78, directing the Secretary of the Navy to transmit certain information relating to armor plate ordered by the Navy Department during the last 25 years, and asked for its immediate consideration. Under the rules the resolution went over on objection for one day, and it is now on the table. I gave notice that at the earliest opportunity I should ask for its immediate consideration. When I obtained the floor for that purpose I ascertained that the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] was momentarily absent, and I did not desire to ask for its consideration in his absence. So there has been a delay of some days during which I have been seeking opportunity to have the resolution considered and adopted.

Therefore, Mr. President, this being the earliest opportunity I have had, in accordance with the notice I have heretofore given, I ask that Senate resolution 78 be laid before the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. I simply wish to say to the Senator from Indiana that if action is taken on this resolution it will displace the unfinished business.

Mr. ASHURST. I do not wish to displace the unfinished business.

Mr. SMOOT. That is exactly what the effect will be.

Mr. ASHURST. I do not wish to displace the unfinished business. While the resolution upon which I ask action is of much importance, I believe the unfinished business is of paramount importance at this particular time. I therefore give notice that immediately upon the laying aside of, or the conclusion of, the unfinished business I shall ask for action upon this Senate resolution No. 78.

Our Republican friends on the other side of the aisle have recently fulminated very much and thundered in the index over public hearings, and if they are sincere they will all vote to adopt the resolution I have introduced, so that the American people may see where their money goes. You claim you want "light." If you assist in passing this resolution, you will see how the Steel Trust mulcted this Government to the tune of $1,600,000 in furnishing the armor plate that is to be used in building the superdreadnought Pennsylvania.

THE TARIFF.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] has the floor on the unfinished business.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. KERN. I yield for a moment to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I wish to inquire of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], the ranking member of the minority of the Finance Committee, if it is possible to have an agreement providing for a vote on the motion to refer the tariff bill to the Finance Committee and his amendment thereto.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, before answering the Senator's question directly, I should like in two or three words to explain the matter.

The impression has gone forth, I do not know how, that I and others associated with me are mixed up in some kind of a filibuster on this motion. There is absolutely no foundation for such a statement or such an impression. When the Senator from North Carolina made his motion to refer the bill to the Finance Committee, I moved my amendment in good faith, expecting immediate action on that day or very soon after offering the motion to the Senate. Then, without any concerted action, as must be evident to every Senator, a debate sprang up between the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], followed by a general discussion of tariff questions by many Senators. Then the proceedings were unfortunately interrupted early yesterday by the Senate voting to go into executive session. So that, so far as any delay in this matter is concerned, I feel entirely innocent of any intention or of any act in the direction of delay.

I recognize, Mr. President, that there would be no object in attempting to delay at this stage of the discussion. The position of the bill is purely a technical one. The fact that it has not yet been referred to the committee does not make a particle of difference, because the majority members of the Finance Committee, as I am informed, are going ahead in their conferences as rapidly as they can to perfect the bill, and the mere fact that the bill is not technically——

Mr. SIMMONS. I will say to the Senator——

Mr. PENROSE. I am not going to make a speech.

Mr. SIMMONS. Just at this point in the Senator's statement I wish to say that the debate on this question is interfering materially with the work of the Finance Committee.

Mr. PENROSE. I imagine the public debates are interfering considerably with the private conferences on the tariff. In order, therefore, to facilitate these matters and to show my perfect good will I want to cooperate with the Senator in getting early action.

I wish to say, Mr. President, that I have never in the considerable period in which I have been in the Senate engaged in a filibustering expedition. I think my record in that respect will be borne out by all my colleagues who have served with me for a period of 15 years or more. I have, with patient fortitude, looked on at the filibustering expeditions and piratical methods of others now in the majority and then in the minority of this body. I have never criticized them, believing that they were strictly within the rules of the Senate and the precedents, and that they were doing what they thought best for their party and for the legislation in which they believed. I have endeavored, with patience, to wait until the opportunity occurred for bringing about legislation, or if it did not occur I have taken the result with equanimity.

As I said, nothing would be gained by making delay in the bill at this stage. Anything that would be said now can be said later. I had intended to speak at length to the Senate on the importance of hearings, but after the request for hearings is voted down I can just as well exploit my views to this body as to the whole proceeding.

I want to state further, Mr. President, that, as far as I know, there is no disposition on the minority side to engage in any filibuster during the considerable period that will intervene before the final passage of this measure. Legitimate discussion upon every paragraph is all that I want, and, as far as I know, it is all that any of my associates want. That I believe they are entitled to, and on that we will insist. While that may take up considerable time, it will not have in it any elements of undue delay and certainly no elements of a filibuster.

If the Senator from North Carolina has any suggestion to make as to when a vote may be taken on the pending motion, I shall be glad to hear from him.

Mr. SIMMONS and Mr. WORKS addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair recognizes the Senator from North Carolina. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. WORKS. Before the Senator from North Carolina and the Senator from Pennsylvania arrive at any understanding about this matter I desire to say that I shall want to submit some remarks upon the motion itself. I certainly have no intention of delaying final action upon the motion; but a discussion has been precipitated here and statements have been made that will leave a false impression upon the minds of the Senate and the Committee on Finance as to the conditions in my State, and I shall desire before this matter is concluded to submit a few remarks for that reason. Of course, I understand perfectly that we may discuss this matter further along; but this question has been partially discussed here now, and I am not content to allow the impression that will most certainly follow what has been said to remain upon the minds of Senators without some answer with respect to it.

I submit this consideration so that Senators may take that into account.

Mr. PENROSE. I do not attempt to speak for any of my colleagues. The Senator from North Carolina called on me, and I answered him that it was for the Senate to give unanimous consent.

Mr. SIMMONS. I called on the Senator from Pennsylvania because he is the ranking member of the minority of the Finance Committee.

Mr. PENROSE. Has the Senator any suggestion to make as to when a vote shall be taken on the motion?

Mr. SIMMONS. Of course I do not desire in any way to cut off legitimate debate on the motion or on the amendment. I am perfectly willing to fix a time that would allow a reasonable opportunity for all Senators who desire to discuss it.

Mr. PENROSE. How would next Monday do?

Mr. SIMMONS. I think we might dispose of this matter to-morrow.

Mr. PENROSE. Well.

Mr. SIMMONS. As I said a little while ago, it is interfering somewhat with the work of the committee. I meant by that, of course, that it is taking our time from that work to attend the sessions of the Senate. It is a matter of special interest to the members of the Finance Committee, and I think we ought to dispose of this question. I would suggest that if we agreed to vote at 4 o'clock to-morrow it would give abundant opportunity. I do not think from the conference I have just had with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] that it is likely the unfinished business to-day will take up all the afternoon. There might be some opportunity to discuss the motion this afternoon, and after to-day we would have all of the morning hour practically to-morrow for its discussion and then two hours in addition to the morning hour.

Mr. PENROSE. If the chairman of the Finance Committee wants to fix as early a date as he indicates for the disposition of this matter, I suggest that the Senator from Indiana consent to lay aside the unfinished business until to-morrow, and also, of course, executive business.

Mr. LODGE. If we are to vote to-morrow, we ought to have more time.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know that it is the intention to go into executive session for a long time this afternoon.

Mr. SMOOT. Before any time is agreed upon to vote on the motion, I wish to have it distinctly understood that no executive session will be held until after the motion is voted upon.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not think it is the purpose to hold any extended executive session to-day.

Mr. PENROSE. Any executive session must be extended at the present juncture of affairs.

Mr. SIMMONS. That might be true, Mr. President, unless it was agreed that the matter which is now tying up the Senate would not be taken up for consideration. Such an agreement might be very easily reached, I think.

Mr. SMOOT. It was not reached last night.

Mr. SIMMONS. I mean to-day.

Mr. PENROSE. There may be other snags to be struck.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know to what extent the Senator may have entered on a filibuster as to other matters. I know that last night he or his colleagues were filibustering as to the matter which was before the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. I trust the Senator from North Carolina will not give away the secrets of the executive session.

Mr. SIMMONS. If I have given away any secret, I withdraw it.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I ask for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington has called for the regular order, which is the unfinished business, and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SIMMONS. I hope the Senator from Washington will withhold his demand, that we may see if we can reach an agreement.

Mr. JONES. I think we are wasting time and that we will make more time by going on with the regular order.

Mr. PENROSE. I never heard the term "wasting time" applied to talk in the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. We might as well save time by reaching an agreement now.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. RANSDELL. I wish to have just two or three moments to answer a question. I do not want to debate but just to answer the question asked me.

Mr. KERN. I object to that. The Senator has given notice to the Senate that he intends to make further remarks.

Mr. RANSDELL. I do not want to make any further remarks. A question was asked me. It will round out the little speech I made this morning. The first that I have had the pleasure of making in the Senate, and one I did not expect to make, will be rounded out, if I can answer the question. It will not take more than three minutes.

Mr. KERN. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington consent? The Senator from Washington has called for the regular order.

Mr. RANSDELL. I ask the Senator from Washington to withdraw the demand for just a moment.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I can not prevent the Senator from Indiana yielding to the Senator from Louisiana. If he desires to yield to him, I would not prevent it if I could.

Mr. KERN. I have yielded on certain conditions, which, of course, I take it, will be observed.

Mr. RANSDELL. In answer to the question of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], I wish to say that he draws a very different construction from this clause of the Democratic platform from that which I draw and to which I think it is fairly entitled. Let us consider the circumstances under which this platform was framed.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I yielded to the Senator from Louisiana under the impression that he desired to answer a question that had just been propounded to the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]. I can not yield for this exposition of Democratic principles.

Mr. RANSDELL. I do not want to do that, Mr. President.

Mr. KERN. I decline to yield.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. ROOT. It is that the Senator from Indiana, having yielded the floor to the Senator from Louisiana not for a question but for a speech, has lost the floor and no longer has the right to object to the Senator from Louisiana proceeding.

Mr. KERN. When I yielded to the Senator from Louisiana for a specific purpose under a misapprehension of the facts as to what the purpose was, I think I have the right to claim the floor.

Mr. RANSDELL. I hope the Senator will not insist. It will not take me long.

Mr. President, when that fact——

Mr. KERN. What does the Chair decide?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair decides that the Senator from Indiana has the floor, if he insists upon it.

Mr. KERN. Then, I call for the regular order.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will venture to suggest to the Senator from Louisiana that under the absence of rules in the Senate, the Senator can address himself to the unfinished business as well as to anything else.

Mr. KERN. I ask for the regular order, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana has been recognized.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. KERN. I do not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The unfinished business will be proceeded with, and the Senator from Indiana has the floor.

PAINT CREEK COAL FIELDS OF WEST VIRGINIA.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Senate resolution 37, submitted by Mr. KERN April 12, 1913, and reported by Mr. WILLIAMS from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate April 28, 1913, with a substitute.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, after the governor of West Virginia announced the other day that he desired an investigation as called for in the resolution now before the Senate, and after the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] had declared here that he agreed with Gov. Hatfield that the matter might be investigated, and that since he has seen the statement he wanted it investigated and should not object, I did not suppose that there would be further objection to the adoption of this resolution. I do not know whether there is any desire to pursue the discussion of the resolution or not. If not, it may be voted upon. If there is to be further discussion, I shall take part in it. The question, of course, is upon the adoption of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. CHILTON. If the Senator from Idaho will indulge me, I gave notice the other day when this matter was up that I was going to move that the resolution should take the regular course and be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor to investigate the facts which are alleged and to report regularly upon the resolution. I now make that motion, so that it may be discussed in connection with anything else germane to the matter.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have no desire to discuss this matter. If I understand the Senator from West Virginia correctly, his statement is that the opposition to the resolution has ceased.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion of the Senator from West Virginia is that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I originally introduced this resolution in the Senate, and as there has been some reference to that in the debate I think I may properly trespass upon the time of the Senate for a few moments to state some facts concerning the resolution.

I readily agree that I was not in possession of all the facts which I should like to have had possession of at the time I introduced the resolution. It was introduced upon facts furnished me largely from newspaper reports. Had I been in possession of all the facts which I desired, I should not have introduced the resolution. It was introduced for the purpose of ascertaining, indeed, what the facts were, not being able to ascertain definitely as to the facts without an investigation.

It is needless to say that in introducing the resolution I had no idea of reflecting upon the governor of the State of West Virginia, either the governor then holding the office or the governor who afterwards succeeded him, nor upon the people of the State of West Virginia. We are all familiar with the history of those people, with their devotion to the Constitution and their loyalty to the flag in a trying hour. We did not have in our mind anything in the nature of a reflection upon either the officers or the people of that State. I hope I do not hasten to the criticism of sworn officers discharging their duty elsewhere, nor would I knowingly reflect upon the people of a State. But there was one fact, Mr. President, which was presented to me which caused me to introduce the resolution, and that I can state in very brief terms. As it was presented to me I did not feel that I could ignore it, or as chairman of the committee refuse to act.

It was asserted in the newspapers, and, as I understand, the assertion is not denied, that men had been arrested and tried by a military tribunal and sentenced to punishment and imprisonment in the penitentiary for two, three, and five years, and that this took place at a time when the civil courts were open and under such circumstances and conditions as, it seemed to me, to entitle them to be tried in the civil courts.

Laying aside all other facts and all other representations in regard to the matter, that one fact alone was sufficient to interest me. It would have caused me to submit the resolution if no other facts had been presented. If it is true that at the time when the civil courts were open men were actually tried for offenses which were committed under the laws of the State by a military tribunal, it is a matter of sufficient concern to move me to act at any time, and, I believe, of sufficient concern to interest anyone who is at all concerned about the perpetuity of the Government under which we live. There can be nothing of more concern than the preserving of those fundamental principles by which causes are tried, where men's liberties and lives are involved, and I would not ignore a condition of affairs which seemed to give to military tribunals the right to try men and take away their liberties unless those men were in the military or naval service.

Now, briefly, that is the one fact which, I understand, is undisputed, and it is the one fact which caused me to be interested in the affairs. I do not say that other matters did not have to do with it, but that was controlling and guiding in the matter.

The case of Moyer against Peabody has been referred to in this argument, I presume, for the purpose in some respect of justifying whatever steps were taken and whatever proceedings were had, but the case of Moyer against Peabody does not justify nor give a precedent for anything in the nature of the transaction which we have here before us, if the facts reported to us are correct. In the syllabi in this case it is said:

What is due process of law depends on circumstances and varies with the subject matter and necessities of the situation.

Truly so; but no court in this country has ever held that, while the civil courts are open, those who are not in the Army or Navy may be intercepted for crimes committed in violation of the law of the State and tried by a military tribunal. No court has ever held that such a trial is "due process of law" under the genius of our institutions. When any court shall have so held and it becomes an established precedent, there will shortly be an end of the fundamental principles upon which this Government rests. Even the inception of such a claim must be denied, the slightest step in such direction must upon the first moment of reflection be retraced.

The declaration of the governor of a State that a state of insurrection exists is conclusive.

Undoubtedly that is true; but the declaration of a governor that a state of insurrection exists does not justify anything and everything which a governor may see fit to do while that state of insurrection exists. There are certain fundamental rights of the citizen which can not be interfered with under such conditions any more than if the state of insurrection did not exist. The powers which belong to the executive in the case of a state of insurrection are pretty well defined, they are pretty well understood, and have been passed upon rather extensively and in detail by the courts; but no court has ever intimated that by reason of that condition of affairs you can arrest a citizen upon the streets of a city for an offense committed against the laws of a State, try him before a military tribunal, and take away his liberty or his life. The governor may properly declare martial law, he may oppose force with the militia of the State, but he may not transfer the jurisdiction to try and punish men for statutory offenses to improvised military tribunals.

The case of Moyer against Peabody was simply a civil suit in which the man who had been deprived of his liberty for a time undertook to recover damages from the governor of the State, it being contended upon the part of the complainant that the action of the governor was not conclusive as to certain matters which he had alleged in his proclamation. The whole case is stated and its limitations noted, so far as it being a precedent in this matter is concerned, in a single paragraph:

Such arrests are not necessarily for punishment, but are by way of precaution to prevent the exercise of hostile power. So long as such arrests are made in good faith and in the honest belief that they are needed in order to head the insurrection off, the governor is the final judge, and can not be subjected to an action after he is out of office on the ground that he had not reasonable ground for his belief. If we suppose a governor with a very long term of office, it may be that a case could be imagined in which the length of the imprisonment would raise a different question. But there is nothing in the duration of the plaintiff's detention or in the allegations of the complaint that would warrant submitting the judgment of the governor to revision by a jury. It is not alleged that his judgment was not honest, if that be material, or that the plaintiff was detained after fears of the insurrection were at an end.

But the case which has more to do with the subject matter in hand is the noted case of ex parte Milligan, which is found in Seventy-first United States, at page 109. It states the principle from which we dare not depart.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator please give the number of the volume from which he previously read?

Mr. BORAH. It is No. 212, United States Reports.

The facts in the case of ex parte Milligan in some respects resemble the facts, as they have been presented to me, as existing in the State of West Virginia. In that case Milligan was arrested and tried before a military tribunal at a time when the civil courts of Indiana were open. I need not read more than a paragraph or two of the opinion, but it is one of the noted cases in the history of our courts, and deals specifically with the right of a citizen to a trial in the civil court under such conditions as are said to prevail in the State of West Virginia. When it came to determine this particular question as to his right of trial under those conditions, the Supreme Court said:

The importance of the main question—

That is, as to whether Milligan could be tried by a military tribunal or must be tried in the court—

The importance of the main question presented by this record can not be overstated, for it involves the very framework of the Government and the fundamental principles of American liberty.

During the late wicked Rebellion the temper of the times did not allow that calmness in deliberation and discussion so necessary to a correct conclusion of a purely judicial question. Then considerations of safety were mingled with the exercise of power, and feelings and interests prevailed which are happily terminated. Now that the public safety is assured this question, as well as all others, can be discussed and decided without passion or the admixture of any element not required to form a legal judgment. We approach the investigation of this case fully sensible of the magnitude of the inquiry and the necessity of full and cautious deliberation.

After reciting the facts more fully, the court says:

The controlling question in the case is this: Upon the facts stated in Milligan's petition and the exhibits filed, had the military commission mentioned in it jurisdiction, legally, to try and sentence him? Milligan, not a resident of one of the rebellious States or a prisoner of war, but a citizen of Indiana for 20 years past and never in the military or naval service is, while at his home, arrested by the military power of the United States, imprisoned, and, on certain criminal charges preferred against him, tried, convicted, and sentenced to be hanged by a military commission, organized under the direction of the military commander of the military district of Indiana. Had this tribunal the legal power and authority to try and punish this man?

No graver question was ever considered by this court, nor one which more nearly concerns the rights of the whole people; for it is the birthright of every American citizen when charged with crime to be tried and punished according to law.

And not according to the ipse dixit, or the passion, or the prejudice, or the opinion of an improvised tribunal. Not according to laws which govern military courts and rules of evidence which there obtain, but according to the law of the land and the rules and practices of common-law courts.

I do not care, Mr. President, what the emergency may be, or what the supposed emergency may be, there is no emergency conceivable which can suspend the operation of the Constitution or suspend the right of a man to have a trial before such a tribunal as is provided for by the general laws of the country. This is the announcement of the greatest of judicial tribunals upon the most vital principle of personal liberty, and, speaking for myself, I will wander from it not a hair's breadth if I know it. In saying this I impute disloyalty to no one else, but under this principle I claim the right to know all the facts when so salutary a principle seems to be denied to any citizen, rich or poor.

The power of punishment is alone through the means which the laws have provided for that purpose, and if they are ineffectual there is an immunity from punishment, no matter how great an offender the individual may be or how much his crimes may have shocked the sense of justice of the country or endangered its safety. By the protection of the law human rights are secured; withdraw that protection and they are at the mercy of wicked rulers or the clamor of an excited people. If there was law to justify this military trial, it is not our province to interfere; if there was not, it is our duty to declare the nullity of the whole proceedings. The decision of this question does not depend on argument or judicial precedents, numerous and highly illustrative as they are. These precedents inform us of the extent of the struggle to preserve liberty and to relieve those in civil life from military trials. The founders of our Government were familiar with the history of that struggle, and secured in a written Constitution every right which the people had wrested from power during a contest of ages. By that Constitution and the laws authorized by it this question must be determined. The provisions of that instrument on the administration of criminal justice are too plain and direct to leave room for misconstruction or doubt of their true meaning. Those applicable to this case are found in that clause of the original Constitution which says, "That the trial of all crimes, except in case of impeachment, shall be by jury"; and in the fourth, fifth, and sixth articles of the amendments. The fourth proclaims the right to be secure in person and effects against unreasonable search and seizure, and directs that a judicial warrant shall not issue "without proof of probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation." The fifth declares "that no person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime unless on presentment by a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service in time of war or public danger, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." And the sixth guarantees the right of trial by jury in such manner and with such regulations that with upright judges, impartial juries, and an able bar the innocent will be saved and the guilty punished. It is in these words: "In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation, to be confronted with the witnesses against him, to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense." These securities for personal liberty thus embodied were such as wisdom and experience had demonstrated to be necessary for the protection of those accused of crime. And so strong was the sense of the country of their importance, and so jealous were the people that these rights, highly prized, might be denied them by implication, that when the original Constitution was proposed for adoption it encountered severe opposition, and but for the belief that it would be so amended as to embrace them it would never have been ratified.

* * * * * * *

The Constitution of the United States is a law for rulers and people, equally in war and in peace, and covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men, at all times, and under all circumstances. No doctrine, involving more pernicious consequences, was ever invented by the wit of man than that any of its provisions can be suspended during any of the great exigencies of Government. Such a doctrine leads directly to anarchy or despotism, but the theory of necessity on which it is based is false; for the Government, within the Constitution, has all the powers granted to it which are necessary to preserve its existence, as has been happily proved by the result of the great effort to throw off its just authority.

* * * * * * *

The discipline necessary to the efficiency of the Army and Navy required other and swifter modes of trial than are furnished by the common-law courts, and, in pursuance of the power conferred by the Constitution, Congress has declared the kinds of trial, and the manner in which they shall be conducted, for offenses committed while the party is in the military or naval service. Everyone connected with these branches of the public service is amenable to the jurisdiction which Congress has created for their government, and, while thus serving, surrenders his right to be tried by the civil courts. All other persons, citizens of States where the courts are open, if charged with crime are guaranteed the inestimable privilege of trial by jury. This privilege is a vital principle, underlying the whole administration of criminal justice; it is not held by sufferance and can not be frittered away on any plea of state or political necessity. When peace prevails and the authority of the Government is undisputed, there is no difficulty of preserving the safeguards of liberty, for the ordinary modes of trial are never neglected, and no one wishes it otherwise; but if society is disturbed by civil commotion—if the passions of men are aroused and the restraints of law weakened, if not disregarded—these safeguards need and should receive the watchful care of those intrusted with the guardianship of the Constitution and laws. In no other way can we transmit to posterity unimpaired the blessings of liberty consecrated by the sacrifices of the Revolution.

Mr. President, I am aware that that is a case in which the court was dealing with a Federal question, or rather it was a proceeding in the Federal courts and under the Federal Constitution. I have not had the time, and did not intend to do so until this resolution should ripen into an investigation, if it should do so, to find out just what the provisions of the State constitution of West Virginia are or what the circumstances and facts were concerning the situation which seems to have led to this trial by the military tribunal; but it was sufficient for me to understand that in a State of this Union men had been seized upon the streets for crimes alleged to be in violation of the laws of a State, tried by an improvised military tribunal, and sent to the penitentiary. It is certainly sufficient to warrant an investigation. If there should be found in the State of West Virginia and in the constitution of West Virginia such provisions as would seem to justify such a proceeding, that of itself would not be sufficient answer, because you can not take away the rights of a citizen of a State without at the same time interfering with the rights of the citizen of the United States.

A man who is a citizen of the State of West Virginia is also a citizen of the United States, and if he has been imprisoned under such conditions it is a matter of supreme concern to the United States, as well as a matter of immediate concern to the people of West Virginia. It was for this reason, Mr. President, so far as I was concerned, that I moved in the first instance with this resolution. There was no sort of politics upon my part. It could hardly be so, because I understood the conditions in West Virginia politically. I assume that there was no sort of politics upon the part of the Senator who afterwards introduced the resolution, and if there is anything that would lead me to have supreme contempt for one of my colleagues in this Chamber it would be for him to undertake to interpose politics in a matter in which the rights of an individual citizen or his liberty were involved. I challenge neither the standing nor patriotism of the governor of West Virginia; I do not now impeach the learning of her judges—they had their duty to perform, and I felt when these facts were presented I had mine to perform.

Mr. President, I am one of those who still believe that the best way to administer justice in this country is through the courts. I have something of an hereditary prejudice, of which I am not anxious to be free, in favor of a trial by jury before an impartial court under the established laws of the country, where the accused may meet the witnesses face to face. It is the best way yet devised, and I will not ignore any encroachment upon this wise system even by tribunals supposed to be born of or made necessary by great emergencies. But, sir, if the courts are to be open to some and not to all, we need waste our time no longer in idle and useless discussion as to whether it is worth while to preserve our judicial system. If there is anything in the world which would lead me to transfer our judicial questions from our courts to town meetings it would be the supplanting of such tribunals by military commissions. These men committed no crime not punishable under the laws of the great Commonwealth of West Virginia, and no one will contend that the courts were either closed or corrupt or afraid, or that honest and fearless men could not be found in the State to sit upon juries and administer justice.

Such affairs as this show most clearly how deep-seated is the love of our people for the methods of trial given us by the fathers, and it is well that it is so. This system is the result of a thousand years of bitter experience and ceaseless struggle. When men are deprived of its benefits, when its wise and salutary methods are withheld, how quickly they feel the force of its justice, its wisdom. For one, Mr. President, I propose, so far as I can, to see that they are not deprived of it. I propose that the humblest, the poorest, the most unjustly accused, as well as the most justly accused, shall have its full benefit. No man can under the genius of our Government be legally punished for crime, not being a member of the naval or military service, except in the orderly and legal way prescribed by our laws and through the judgment of our courts. That these men were tried and punished for ordinary crimes before military tribunals when the courts were open is not denied, as I understand. I for one, therefore, should like to know all the facts which surround such a transaction.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. CHILTON. I want to ask the Senator, inasmuch as he is in favor of the courts determining matters of this kind, that after the Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia has decided upon all of these questions and has held that the proceedings are all sufficient under the laws of that State, where else could you contest it, except in the Supreme Court of the United States? Could the Senate do anything to reverse the Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia?

Mr. BORAH. Undoubtedly the Senate could not do anything to reverse the action of the Court of Appeals of West Virginia; but I do not concede, if such a condition of affairs as has been alleged exists and has been sustained by the courts of West Virginia, that the Senate as a lawmaking body is without power to protect the situation. It may not and would not likely be able to relieve individuals, but if in this Government of ours there is a hiatus wherein and by reason of which such things may be done, then it is time for legislation in preparing for future contingencies.

Mr. CHILTON. Is there any fact that the Senate of the United States could develop which the Senator thinks would not be developed by the parties themselves in an action to obtain their freedom before a proper court; and does the Senator think there could be greater energy here than there would be by the parties themselves in a legal proceeding in the State, or in some other proceeding to correct the proceedings in the State? In other words, I want to find what benefit is going to be derived by having an investigation here under the present state of affairs.

Mr. BORAH. Well, Mr. President, of course it is impossible for the Senator from Idaho to state the benefits which will be derived in their fullness, and I expect it will be very difficult for the Senator from West Virginia to tell the injury which would flow from the proposed investigation if there is nothing to these facts.

Mr. CHILTON. That possibly may be so. Mr. President, while I am on my feet, if the Senator will permit me, I want to say to him that I hope that nothing which I have said led him to believe that I meant to intimate that anything that he did—and I can say the same to the Senator from Indiana—was done on political grounds.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, before the Senator from West Virginia takes his seat, if the Senator from Idaho will permit me, I should like to ask the Senator from West Virginia whether he is to-day of the same opinion that he was the other day, when he said that he would join with the governor of West Virginia in favor of an investigation into these conditions?

Mr. CHILTON. Yes, Mr. President; in a proper way. I think, though, that this resolution is being railroaded. I do not think that both sides have been properly heard. We have a number of ex parte statements put before the Senate here this morning and a number of statements made the other day, but there has been no place where both sides can present their situation. Both sides of the controversy ought to go to a regular committee to investigate. It will not delay anything, and I see no reason why West Virginia should be put up here in the dock and practically convicted before any kind of an investigation has been made by the Senate.

My position has been that if the governor of that State—there are all kinds of rumors about his attitude; some say he wants it, and some say he does not—if the governor of that State insists upon an investigation, I am perfectly willing that it may be undertaken; but I do say that there has been nothing shown here why West Virginia should be made an exception and should be made here the subject of an investigation involving everything practically under the laws of the United States and under the laws of the State, when the same disturbances are going on all around us.

Only three or four days ago practically similar disturbances occurred in the State of Ohio, the near neighbor of the Senator from Indiana; they are going on in New Jersey, and the same kind of thing occurred in Lawrence a year or two ago. Strikes are going on, and disturbances of this kind are occurring where all kinds of allegations are being made upon the one side or the other; and it occurred to me that we ought to take a regular course, and that this resolution should in any event go to a proper committee so that, for instance, the initial facts may be ascertained.

The Senate does not officially know as yet that there has been martial law in the State of West Virginia. The Senate does not officially know that anybody has ever been arrested under martial law in the State of West Virginia. Certainly, the initial facts should be presented to the Senate in some way, and I want them to be determined in the regular way by a regular committee of the Senate.

Mr. KERN. I hoped the Senator, before he took his seat, would answer the question as to whether he is or is not in favor of an investigation of these conditions by the Committee on Education and Labor, and whether he doubts that that committee will give to the State of West Virginia a fair hearing.

Mr. CHILTON. I do not doubt that any committee of the Senate will be fair, Mr. President; of course not. I stated in my remarks the other day exactly my position, and I still stand upon what I said at that time. I do not want an investigation here unless there is some ground for it. I am not afraid to say anything if I believe it right. I do not know what fear is about politics, because coming back to the Senate makes little difference to me. It is never so important to me as it is to be right and not to be a coward, and when things are being said upon this floor that do my State an injustice, I am going to say so here or in any other presence.

I simply want it understood, Mr. President, that if the representations that I understand have been made by the governor of that State are true, and he wants to take the responsibility, I am perfectly willing to say that I will not fight the proposed investigation. Upon principle, however, there is absolutely no precedent and no ground for a State to be treated as West Virginia would be treated if such a resolution as this should be passed, and somebody besides myself will have to take the responsibility. If the Committee on Education and Labor in a proper way shall determine that an investigation is proper, I will not, then, put my State in the position of objecting. I only want a square deal for West Virginia and all her people. I am only opposing the railroading of such a solemn matter.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. ROOT. I wish to ask a question, because I am somewhat puzzled. The resolution, a copy of which I have, appears to have been submitted by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] and to have been reported by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and the Senator from Idaho refers to the resolution introduced by himself.

Mr. BORAH. That is the resolution introduced at the last session by myself.

Mr. ROOT. Is it the same as the pending resolution?

Mr. BORAH. It is practically the same. I do not know that it is verbally the same, but it is in substance the same.

Mr. ROOT. While I am on my feet, may I make a suggestion? It is a suggestion born of a very deep sympathy with what the Senator from Idaho has said, because if it appears in any proper way that in any State or anywhere within the jurisdiction of the United States men are deprived of their life, liberty, or property without due process of law, or that they are denied equal protection of the law, and that that deprivation comes from the overwhelming authority of a State, I am in favor, not of relegating the weak individual to his action in the courts, but of inquiry into it, to the end that we may see whether we may not correct it by the power of the United States I sympathize with the Senator from Idaho in what he has said, but it does not appear to me that this resolution as it now stands is aptly framed to accomplish that result. I should question two things—one is whether the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate is the committee which should frame such a resolution. I supposed their function to be to pass upon the question of the expense involved. So that this resolution now has practically not been considered and reported by any committee which has jurisdiction to do two things, both of which should be done. One is to ascertain whether there is any such reasonable cause to believe the evil exists as to set in motion the investigating powers of the Senate to take it out of the realm of the newspaper report. The other is to pass upon the terms of the resolution to be adopted by the Senate in order to bring about the investigation.

Mr. President, it is a very serious and solemn proceeding for the Senate of the United States to resolve itself into a grand jury for the purpose of passing upon the acts of a State of the Union to the end that the supreme authority of the Constitution of the United States shall be enforced. We should be careful about the terms of the resolution that we pass, and we should be careful to see to it that we have grounds for taking the action. It seems to me, with the fullest agreement with the Senator from Idaho, that an appropriate committee should consider whether there be something more than rumor, which is not entitled to consideration, and should see to it that the resolution upon which we are to act is properly adapted to secure the results which ought to be secured.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator from New York is undoubtedly correct in the proposition that the resolution should be so framed as to accomplish that which we desire to accomplish. I have not undertaken to follow the modus operandi of the proceedings with reference to getting this resolution to the point where we can finally act under it. I only know the general principle which was announced in the resolution at the time it was introduced by the Senator from Indiana; and I felt then, and I feel now, that, so far as the language of the resolution itself is concerned, we will be able to gather all of the facts which it is necessary to gather. As to the advisability of having another committee pass upon it, that is a matter of detail which we can later discuss more at length.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have been unfortunately out of the Chamber during the discussion that has been going on; at least I have been out most of the time; but I understand the Senator from Idaho introduced a resolution of the same character as the one pending, perhaps in the same language, at the last session of Congress.

Mr. BORAH. I did.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. We are compelled to call the attention of Senators to the fact that we are not able to hear on this side of the Chamber.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Was that resolution referred to the Committee on Education and Labor?

Mr. BORAH. My recollection is that it was, but I would not want to be definite with regard to that.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Was there any investigation of the subject by the Committee on Education and Labor?

Mr. BORAH. There was not. The resolution was introduced at a time when we were not doing a great deal of business except doing nothing, toward the close of the session, when we were unable to get committee meetings.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, we are unable to hear on this side of the Chamber anything that is being said on that side.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I want to call attention to a clear breach of the rules of the Senate, in that Senators are addressing each other instead of addressing the Presiding Officer. If Senators will address the Presiding Officer we will all be able to hear what is said.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator will permit me, I understand it is charged that in the State of West Virginia military courts, or so-called military courts, have been organized, that citizens have been arrested and brought before those courts, prosecuted, convicted, and imprisoned.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, that is correct.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That, thus far, is entirely correct?

Mr. BORAH. It is, as I understand the facts.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Of course I know nothing about the facts, except as I have seen some statements in the newspapers. Has the Senator any other foundation for the statement than the newspaper stories?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have the statements of those who were in prison, made to me personally; so I feel reasonably certain that they could not be mistaken.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I should like to ask the Senator one other question, and that is whether or not this condition still prevails in West Virginia; that is to say, whether these so-called military tribunals are still in existence and operation and men are still being arrested.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not understand that they are now proceeding to try them. I do not understand that the military tribunals are really in existence. Perhaps they could be called into existence very quickly if the necessity arose. But I do understand that some of the prisoners are still in prison by reason of the judgment of the military tribunal.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I want to say to the Senator that if that condition prevails in the State of West Virginia, in my judgment the Constitution of the United States is very clearly being violated, and I should think it would be the duty of Congress to cause an investigation of it to be made. I should like to know, however, before I am called upon to act in the matter, whether or not that condition is still going on; and if there is any definite information on that subject in the hands of anybody I should like very much to have it.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, in response to the inquiry of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] as to whether the conditions in West Virginia, so well described by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], still exist, I want to say that I hold in my hand a copy of the Huntington (W. Va.) Herald-Dispatch, said to be published by Gen. Isaac Mann, a prominent Republican, who was recently a candidate for the United States Senate. It bears date May 10, 1913. It contains an article headed "Five Socialist prisoners taken to capital city. Under military guard, the men were removed to Charleston."

There also appears in the same issue a news item from Charleston, and purports to give an interview with the governor, from which I quote:

In an interview late to-night Gov. Hatfield intimated that few, if any, cases would be tried by the military commission in the martial-law zone of Kanawha County.

"I shall turn over those prisoners who violate the law in the military district, such as assaults and carrying firearms, to the civil authority. Those who have been aiding and abetting and publishing inflammatory newspaper articles I will hold under chapter 14 of the code, which gives me that authority," he said.

The first article gives an account of the arrest, by order of the governor, of five men connected with the publication of a newspaper.

I have here statements from reputable gentlemen in Huntington who tell about members of a militia company breaking up and destroying a newspaper plant last week. I have here affidavits of men who were denied admission to a United States post office in West Virginia because they were union men, the post office being located in the Sullivan Coal Co.'s store.

This affidavit is one that was made May 12. The affiant says:

That on the 12th day of April, 1913, he joined the organization known as the United Mine Workers of America, affiliating himself with Local Union No. 2938; that a few days after his joining said union, to wit, on the 19th day of April, 1913, affiant went to the post office at Sullivan, W. Va., for the purpose of getting his mail, and after arriving at said post office, or near the same, he was informed that the train was 30 minutes late, he thereupon sat down on the store porch, within which store the post office was located, the said post office being in the coal company's store at said point, and while he was thus waiting Bird Humphries, Richard Hudson, A. C. Underwood, and A. Peyton, who were in the employ of the Sullivan Coal Co. as Baldwin-Feltz Guards, assaulted, beat, and wounded him and forced him to leave said post office and said town of Sullivan without first securing his mail.

Another affidavit is from an Italian subject, Frank Angelo, who has been in the United States for 11 years:

That on the said 13th day of April, 1913, he, together with Joe Blank, were on their way from said mine to the post office located at said McAlpine; that before they reached said post office they were accosted by Ash Dixon, a Baldwin-Feltz guard in the employ of said McAlpine Coal Co., the said guard inquiring of affiant and the said Joe Blank where they were going, to which they, and each of them, replied that they were on their way to the post office to get their mail; thereupon the said Ash Dixon refused to allow said affiant and the said Joe Blank to go to said post office, and threatening them with personal violence in event they or each of them attempted so to do, thereupon affiant was prevented, together with the said Joe Blank, from having access to said post office and were compelled to return without having secured their mail or asked for same at said post office.

Affiant says that he believes the action of the said guard was caused by the fact that he, together with the said Joe Blank, had a few days prior to the date hereinbefore named affiliated themselves with the local union located at Sophia, W. Va., of the United Mine Workers of America, said affiant having been told by said guard a few days before the happening of the matters hereinbefore mentioned that he would have to leave the creek upon which the mines were located, at which he had been working, because of the fact that he had joined the union above mentioned.

I have still another short affidavit to the same effect:

S. T. Perkey, being duly sworn, says that he is a resident of the county of Raleigh, State of West Virginia; that he was present at McAlpine on the 9th day of April, 1913, when Ash Dixon, a Baldwin-Feltz guard, refused to allow Frank Angelo and Joe Blank access to the post office at said point; that he heard the said Angelo and Blank state to the said guard that they were on their way to the post office, and heard the said guard make threats to the said Angelo and Blank that in the event they attempted to go to the said post office that he would beat their heads off, and that the quickest way that they could get back to Sophia or leave the district would be the best for them.

I received this morning a letter, from a man who writes intelligently, from Hilltop, W. Va.:

I live close to Scarbro, W. Va., but I have been ordered to stay away from that place by the mine guards. So, you see, I have to go twice as far after my mail up to Hilltop post office. Nineteen hundred and two I was excluded from the Dun Loop post office, and this is the second time I have had to change my office. I want to tell you the conditions in West Virginia are beyond endurance. We are worse than chattel slaves down here in West Virginia. I am only one, but I am expressing the feelings of thousands of poor coal diggers.

Then he calls my attention to certain sections of the law, and adds:

I am 36 years old. I have never been arrested in my life. I have been in court only as a witness and as a juror. I am ordered to stay away from my post office by the guards employed by the coal company.

I might go on here at great length, I will say to the Senator from Utah, describing conditions as they are now. In the past two weeks two newspapers have been suppressed—one in Charleston and one in Huntington. Word comes to me from every part of West Virginia, not only from union men but from business men, from school-teachers, from men apparently of high character and standing, who say that the conditions there are intolerable and have not been exaggerated by the papers.

I received this morning a letter from the principal of a school in West Virginia. I will not give the name of the place. It is a well-known place, but because of the presence of a coal-mine owner whom I saw in the cloakroom here to-day I am afraid the writer of this letter would lose his place if I should mention the name of the town. He says:

I am not a labor leader, as you can see by my stationery, but I do like to see persons get their just dues. I was in the Paint Creek region 40 days last summer as first sergeant of Company H, First Infantry, West Virginia National Guards, and I know that an investigation into the coal-mining situation in our State will be a good thing.

I am only a citizen and have but a little influence, but I want you to push this matter to the limit, because as I see the situation in Paint and Cabin Creeks and here in my own county and surrounding counties if something is not done by the powers higher up something will be done by the powers lower down, and you know what that means to a State.

Hoping you will give this sufficient time to glance over it and accept it as the opinion of one not directly interested, I am, etc.

So I say from all over this State during the past two weeks I have had statements of this kind. I have had statements from people in distant States, who say they have been driven out of West Virginia because of their political and industrial connections, and who are pleading for an investigation by the United States Senate. I say this only in answer to the question of the Senator from Utah. These statements give conditions as they exist to-day, as they existed last week, as they have existed all the time.

While I am on my feet, Mr. President, I want to say that I hope this resolution, as reported by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, will not be sidetracked. The resolution as originally introduced by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] provided that a committee of three Members of the Senate should be appointed to investigate these questions. When I reintroduced the resolution I adopted the language of the original resolution. I was in favor of a committee of three Senators, because it was thought that three Senators might be found whose duties on other committees would not prevent their going into this field and seeing for themselves and summoning witnesses who might be accessible, to the end that the truth might be known. But when the matter was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate that committee thought it best that the question of investigation should be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor rather than to a committee of three Senators.

Of course a strong effort has been made to defeat or, if not to defeat, to sidetrack and postpone this investigation by influences from West Virginia and elsewhere. Senators on this floor, numbers of them, have received telegrams urging that course. While the matter rested in the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, Senators received telegrams from a coal-mine owner of great wealth urging against the investigation. No more important question, it seems to me, has been presented to the Senate since I became a Member of it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. KERN. I do.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state to the Senator, Mr. President, that there was another reason which the committee took into consideration in having the investigation referred to the Committee on Education and Labor. It was that the resolution, as introduced, provided for clerical assistance. It was thought that if the matter were heard by the Committee on Education and Labor there would be no necessity for special clerical assistance, and that as it was a standing committee having matters of that kind in charge it would be more appropriate that the resolution should be referred to that committee to be investigated by it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. KERN. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator has just said that telegrams were received from a rich coal-mine owner of West Virginia. I received a telegram from a man that I presume would come under that nomenclature, who recently occupied a seat in this body. That man did not ask me to undertake to suppress this investigation, however, but asked for delay so that the junior Senator from West Virginia might be present when it was considered. I exerted myself to secure a little delay for the simple purpose of having present the junior Senator from West Virginia, who, I understood, desired to offer some amendments to the resolution. The Senator recognizes the fact, I think, that the telegrams came from ex-Senator Watson, who, I will say, does not belong to my political party.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, this is not a political question. For months and months charges have been made in the public press regarding conditions in West Virginia, not by the so-called yellow press but by newspapers and magazines of the highest respectability. Most of these newspapers, in view of the facts disclosed—although many of the most important facts were suppressed—have asked for an investigation by the Senate, to the end that the public may know whether or not these charges are true.

I think the New York Globe can hardly be accused of being a yellow newspaper or being particularly in sympathy with labor, either organized or unorganized. Yet the New York Globe, since this resolution has been pending, has the following:

> This West Virginia outbreak has been of such character and on so extended a scale; it has cost so much in life, property, and business to a great State; it has indicated such a tensity of feeling between the miners and the operators that there is need for the community to know what it was about and on which side lay the merits. A settlement that merely sends the men back into the diggings, without assurance that the trouble may not break out again at any time, will not be satisfactory.
> It is quite within the present demands of an exacting public sentiment toward these questions of industrial condition and human welfare that a thorough study should be made of such a situation. The whole Nation is turning its thoughts to this great set of issues. It can not think accurately or decide rightly until it knows the facts. Therefore, whether there is a present settlement or not, the inquiry ought to go ahead. If this course is taken, the chance of a future outbreak will be lessened.

I call attention to a digest of newspaper opinions on this subject published in the Literary Digest of April 5 of the present year.

"This thing of trying civilians by court-martial is a dangerous proceeding, for, if allowed, there is hardly any limit to its abuse," remarks the Houston Post, and the New York Evening Post—surely not a "yellow" paper—agrees that it is a "vicious practice."

"West Virginia does what the United States can not do," says the New York World. "It suspends the civil law in time of peace." This paper continues:

> The President of the United States is specifically forbidden to suspend the writ of habeas corpus except in cases of invasion or rebellion. The governor of West Virginia exercises that power in the presence of a sordid disagreement over work and wages.
> There can be no such thing as martial law under Federal sanction even in time of war except in territory in which the civil authority has ceased. The civil courts of West Virginia, in full operation, are ignored by tribunals presided over by militiamen.
> More than the welfare of one monopoly-ridden State is involved in this tyranny. It menaces the peace of every State. It is a wrong that will rankle in millions of hearts. It is an injustice that will embitter political and industrial controversies from sea to sea. It is an error that even the most infatuated of employers must see can lead only to mischief and reprisal.
> The American people will not be denied trial by jury. They will not submit to despotism. If the puppets of privilege who now dragoon West Virginia do not know this, some of their powerful friends and backers among the coal magnates should instruct them speedily.

I want to quote from the New York Tribune. An editorial utterance of that paper ought to command respect on the other side:

> If anywhere in the world workmen need organization in order to protect their interests it is in the West Virginia coal-mining district, where the strike is. * * *
>
> In the West Virginia coal fields the mine operators are the landlords, the local merchants—for the miners trade at the company stores—and they are very much of the local government so far as there is any in those mountains. Indeed, they have always been a large part of the State government, too. Each way the miner turns he comes up against the employing corporation. When he rents a house it must be at the company's terms. When he buys food and clothes he must pay the company's prices. And when he seeks his legal rights, it must be from authorities that are likely to be subservient to the great local industry. It is a species of industrial serfdom to which he is subjected. * * *
> All American instinct for fair play opposes leaving workers as defenseless against aggression and oppression as these West Virginia miners, unorganized, are.

Mr. President, during these past months it has been known of all men in this country that there were disturbances in West Virginia. What those disturbances were was not accurately known, because, as I pointed out here the other day, a zone had been created in the midst of which these mines were situated, in the midst of which the military commission was planted, and in which zone there was such a condition that the greatest news-gathering agency in America did not dare send its representatives there to report the trial of one of the most famous women in America that was going on there. But Collier's Weekly sent a representative there in the person of Mrs. Fremont Older, a lady who brought me a letter of introduction the other day from a Cabinet officer, who described her as one of the best women in America. She went there. She found access there in some way, and in the most graphic manner she laid before that part of the public who are readers of Collier's Weekly the horrible conditions that prevailed there within 300 miles of the National Capital. Everybody's Magazine has published other accounts of those conditions.

The Pittsburgh Leader is another paper in which I have seen accounts written by a correspondent who declares that he himself was imprisoned in that military district on no other charge than that he was there seeking to gather the truth about the situation.

These charges have been made through the length and breadth of the land, and I confess I do not understand the attitude of the mine owners of West Virginia and their friends, when in the face of all these charges, charges that go to their patriotism and to their manhood, they come before the American Senate and seek to sidetrack or to stifle the proposition to have an investigation that the truth may be known. It seems to me that they of all men, if they are fair, square Americans, and love their country, who care for the good opinion of their fellow men, would be the very first to come here and demand that this investigation shall be had and that they shall be cleared of these damning charges.

My friend, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], said he was not apprised as to the provisions of the constitution of West Virginia or as to what safeguards——

Mr. LODGE. Before the Senator takes up that point about the constitution of West Virginia, I should like to ask him a question in regard to the framing of the resolution.

In subdivision 5, line 8, on page 4, he uses the words "in adjusting such strike."

Mr. KERN. I do not think that should be in the resolution. I do not know but that it was in the original resolution.

Mr. LODGE. It is repeated in the amended form, reported from the Committee on Contingent Expenses.

Mr. KERN. It will do no harm, I assure the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, what strike?

Mr. KERN. There was a strike.

Mr. LODGE. I mean there is no strike described in the resolution. It says "such strike." There is no reference whatever to it in the resolution.

Mr. KERN. I do not know as to that. I simply took the printed resolution as it was introduced at the last session and reintroduced it with the amendment——

Mr. LODGE. I understand; but certainly some committee, somebody who is responsible, ought to make that intelligible. That is all I am trying to get at.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, as this all seems to come back to me, I will make it intelligible by suggesting that we strike out the fifth paragraph entirely, because I do not think it adds anything to or takes anything away from the strength of the resolution. If the Senator from Indiana thinks there is no particular virtue in the fifth subdivision I will move that it be stricken out.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator will see the point I make. It uses the words "such strike" and does not describe to what strike it refers.

Mr. KERN. It ought to be stricken out. It has no place there.

Mr. ROOT. It probably refers to the preamble of a former resolution.

Mr. BORAH. Not to a preamble, but to the subconsciousness of the one who drew it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. May the Chair interpose in order that the Chair may know the exact status? Has the fifth clause of the resolution been stricken out by unanimous consent? Does it go out by unanimous consent? The Chair so understands it, and the fifth clause is out of the resolution.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, in regard to the sixth clause, I agree very strongly with the argument the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] made with respect to the importance of protecting every citizen in his rights under the Constitution. This says "the laws of the United States." It seems to me the rights which are said to have been infringed are constitutional rights, if they are anything.

Mr. BORAH. Technically the Senator from Massachusetts is entirely correct, but the Constitution itself is the fundamental law of the United States.

Mr. LODGE. We usually refer to it as "the Constitution and laws."

Mr. BORAH. I think the language suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts is preferable. I am always glad to have his assistance as to the correct use of language.

Mr. LODGE. Let it read "the Constitution and laws," or "the Constitution of the United States."

Mr. BORAH. The resolution is now under the control of the Senator from Indiana, and I have simply made the suggestion.

Mr. LODGE. I call the attention of the Senator from Indiana to it, because under this sixth article we are certainly asked to take a step of very great gravity. If we are going to investigate the action of a State of this Union, and the Senator from Indiana said the State of West Virginia would be fairly treated by the Committee on Education and Labor—I do not know exactly our powers in bringing a State of the Union to the bar of the Senate, but if we are going to investigate the action of a State I think we ought to proceed very carefully and in very careful language, so that it may be known that we are resting the investigation on the fundamental law of the United States, which is supreme in the States.

Mr. KERN. The remark made by the Senator from Indiana as to the proposed dealing with the State of West Virginia was in response to the statement made by the Senator from West Virginia. There is no purpose to arraign any State here. He having referred to the State of West Virginia, I asked him if he did not think the State of West Virginia would have a fair hearing before the Committee on Education and Labor. This resolution directs the committee to make a thorough and complete investigation of the conditions existing in certain parts of West Virginia for the purpose of ascertaining, among other things, whether or not parties are being convicted and punished in violation of the laws of the United States.

Do I understand the Senator's objection is to the omission of the word "Constitution"? As has already been aptly and truly stated by the Senator from Idaho, it is regarded everywhere, perhaps except in West Virginia, that the Constitution is the supreme law of the land in both State and Nation. When we inquire whether men have been convicted in violation of law, if it should be found that they have been denied jury trial as the Constitution of the United States provides, as the constitution of the State provides, it might be well found that they were being convicted and punished in violation of the laws of both Nation and State.

I desire to call attention——

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I do not wish by my interrogatory to be understood as antagonizing the Senator's proposition, but of course we have in view practical ends, and I should like to have the Senator state, in case it should be found in the present subject of inquiry that men were convicted in violation of law, what would be the action the Senator would propose in view of that finding. In other words, the thought in my mind is this: I am as fully in sympathy with the views announced and supported in the great Milligan case as anyone possibly can be, and as much opposed to the trial of men by military courts as one can be. I have a very vivid recollection of the time when that great case was decided and the great feeling of relief which was brought to a very large section of this country.

But the thought in my mind was, if the laws are being violated and if anyone is being imprisoned in violation of law, is there any practical remedy that the Senate of the United States can apply?

I repeat, without antagonizing the Senator at all, looking to practical ends, if a committee shall find that men have been convicted and imprisoned by order of a military court and in violation of law, what we would all concede to be in violation of law, which no one will recognize more fully than myself, what practical remedy can the Senate of the United States or even the Congress of the United States apply?

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, that question is as difficult of solution as would be the solution of the question as to what would be done to guarantee a State republican form of government, as provided by the Constitution of the United States. In these latter days, when evils are found to exist not only in this country, but in other countries where people are being oppressed, citizens deprived of their rights, conditions intolerable springing up, it has been found to be of great benefit to turn on the light to the end that public attention may be drawn to the conditions, and, when that is done, as a rule there is a way found to remedy the wrong.

I am unable, as the Senator knew I would be, to point out the precise thing that the Senate of the United States might do in case this condition was found to exist. The question was asked here last summer when the proposition was made for an investigation as to child labor in various parts of the country, What are you going to do about it; what will be the practical results of that investigation? Yet it is known to all men that where light is turned on where conditions of oppression exist there is in this country a public sentiment, sometimes in the immediate vicinity, at any rate in the country at large, that will make itself felt in the righting of the wrong and the cleaning up of the foul places.

Now, to return to the question as to what the Constitution——

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me, I repeat I am not doing this in any antagonism, but I am in search of light. The Senator said he could not suggest what precise action the Senate could take in case that particular fact were ascertained, which seems to be pretty well known from the information the Senator gives us and what has been found in the press, in letters, and so forth. The Senator said he could not specify what precise action could be taken. I am looking to practical ends. I understand that we can not properly make investigations except for practical purposes. Can the Senator suggest any action that the Senate could take? I do not say what precise action it would take, but any action that it could take.

Mr. KERN. I have answered the Senator's question as fully as I can.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. KERN. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I might suggest, in the absence of any other right—and I am not conceding that there is no legal power, if we were to discover that citizens of the United States were being deprived of their liberty without due process of law in any State and they had no legal remedy, and that fact was laid before the Senate and the country—we might at least submit a constitutional amendment if we could not do anything else to remedy it, because such a condition as that would be so grave as to call for that kind of important action.

Mr. BACON. I should like to ask the Senator if his predicate is not one that is not to be considered as possible when he says "if there is no remedy"? Whenever one is imprisoned illegally there certainly is a remedy.

Mr. REED. I said "if there is no other remedy." Mr. President, I am trespassing on the time of the Senator from Indiana, and I do not desire to do it, but since I have gone this far, if the Senator will pardon a word further——

Mr. KERN. I yield further.

Mr. REED. Suppose the courts of the State and the courts, even, of the United States should hold that when a governor of a State had declared that a condition of war existed no court could go back of that declaration, and it would be taken as conclusive? Therefore, the Supreme Court of the United States itself could not grant relief. Suppose that condition existed? It could be met, certainly, by a constitutional amendment.

I apprehend the Senator is going to refer to the Milligan case, where the court did go back of the alleged facts and examined the real facts; but I am informed, without knowing anything more than the mere statement which was made to me, that the Court of Appeals of West Virginia has already held that the action of the governor was conclusive upon the question of fact, and that war did exist, if he said it existed, whether there ever had been a gun fired or not.

Now, if that should be followed and that doctrine should be adopted by the Supreme Court of the United States, it would be a case that would clearly call for action by this body, and if this body could not act without a constitutional amendment it would be a proper matter to consider with reference to whether we ought to pass upon such an amendment.

Mr. BACON. I again, with the permission of the Senator from Indiana, desire to say that the Senator predicates what he said upon something which can not be assumed either as existing or as possible. The Senator says that if the Supreme Court of the United States should so decide, would we not have the right, or would it not be our duty, and certainly our privilege, to propose an amendment to the Constitution which would cover a case of that kind. We have already an amendment of the Constitution which directly covers it. Here is the language of the Constitution:

> No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law.

The contention here is that these parties have been deprived of liberty without due process of law, and the reasonable presumption is that the Supreme Court of the United States, whenever that question is submitted to it, would hold that that is a question within the jurisdiction of the Federal courts and would enforce the rights of parties under this provision of law which I have just read. I only ask him for the purpose of endeavoring to ascertain what practical end is to be accomplished; in other words, what we can do. The thing that the Senator suggests we can do we have already done, to wit, we have adopted a constitutional amendment which covers that case and guarantees that right.

Mr. REED. Of course everybody knows that provision is in the Constitution, but the question of the construction which the courts may give it becomes a very important one. If the courts should construe it as I indicated it might be necessary to have further constitutional legislation.

Mr. KERN. The facts have been laid before the Senate, and no good purpose can be served by stopping for any metaphysical discussion, the drawing of any hair lines as to what might be the result if certain things were or were not done. The question before the Senate is whether the American people are entitled to have the truth about this situation. Is it within the power of the Senate to throw the light on that spot, and if it is within the constitutional power of the Senate, is it not the duty of the Senate to say, "Let there be light"?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. KERN. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. In view of some suggestions which have been made in regard to the language of this amendment, and in order to strengthen it, would the Senator from Indiana have any objection to inserting the words "Constitution and" in the sixth provision? It now reads:

Whether or not parties are being convicted and punished in violation of the laws of the United States.

It would then read, "punished in violation of the Constitution and laws of the United States."

Mr. KERN. I have no objection whatever to that modification.

Mr. BORAH. If I may have the attention of the Senate, then, I offer the amendment. After the word "the" and before the word "laws," in the sixth subdivision of investigation, I move to insert the words "Constitution and."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 10, after the words "violation of the," insert the words "Constitution and," so as to read:

Sixth. Whether or not parties are being convicted and punished in violation of the Constitution and laws of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will so read.

Mr. KERN. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] and of the other members of this body, particularly those who are lawyers, to certain provisions of the constitution of the State of West Virginia. The first is this remarkable provision, which goes right to the root of some of the questions that we are discussing here to-day:

The provisions of the Constitution of the United States and of this State are operative alike in a period of war as in time of peace, and any departure therefrom, or violation thereof, under the plea of necessity, or any other plea, is subversive of good government and tends to anarchy and despotism.

No similar provision is found in the constitution of any other State with which I am familiar. Let me read it again, and while I am reading it this time, please keep in mind those things that are conceded to have happened in West Virginia within the past three months:

The provisions of the Constitution of the United States and of this State are operative alike in a period of war as in time of peace, and any departure therefrom, or violation thereof, under the plea of necessity, or any other plea, is subversive of good government and tends to anarchy and despotism.

That constitution was adopted in 1872. Does that section of the constitution require any construction? Was it necessary for the Supreme Court of West Virginia in a decision covering some pages to undertake to make that provision plain? The constitution of West Virginia follows almost in terms the language of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Milligan case. I read from page 120, Seventy-first United States Reports. Says the Supreme Court of the United States:

The Constitution of the United States is a law for rulers and people, equally in war and in peace, and covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men at all times and under all circumstances. No doctrine involving more pernicious consequences was ever invented by the wit of man than that any of its provisions can be suspended during any of the great exigencies of government. Such a doctrine leads directly to anarchy or despotism, but the theory of necessity on which it is based is false, for the Government within the Constitution has all the powers granted to it which are necessary to preserve its existence, as has been happily proved by the result of the great effort to throw off its just authority.

Let us go a little further with the constitution of West Virginia.

The military shall be subordinate to civil power; and no citizen, unless engaged in the military service of the State, shall be tried or punished by any military court for any offense that is cognizable by the civil courts of the State.

Does that require construction? Is that language plain?

No citizen, unless engaged in the military service of the State, shall be tried or punished by any military court for any offense that is cognizable by the civil courts of the State.

Yet the Supreme Court of West Virginia has denied the benefit, the privilege, of the writ of habeas corpus to two men who were tried by a military court-martial and imprisoned by the finding and judgment of that military court.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me to ask, for information, whether there has been any effort to have that decision of the Supreme Court of West Virginia carried to the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. KERN. I suppose if the poor men who are now in prison can find money enough to carry it to the Supreme Court of the United States it will be carried there.

Mr. BACON. Suppose they did not have the money to carry it to the Supreme Court of the United States, can we release them?

Mr. KERN. Oh, not at all. After the answer I made the Senator so specifically awhile ago as to the purpose of the investigation and good effects that might come to the public, the public morals, the public weal, by an investigation of this kind, why should he continue to draw the technical point as to what law we will enact in case we find certain things have occurred?

Let us go a little further. The constitution of West Virginia, adopted in 1863, provided as to the writ of habeas corpus as follows:

The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended except when, in time of invasion, insurrection, or other public danger, the public safety may require it.

But when the constitutional convention of 1872 met that section was amended so as to read as follows:

SEC. 4. The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended—

Stopping there and leaving off everything else, making it a part of the fundamental law of West Virginia that under no circumstances should the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus ever be denied to the citizen. That constitution provides further:

No person shall be held to answer for treason, felony, or other crime not cognizable by a justice unless on presentment or indictment of a grand jury.

Article III, section 10, provides that—

No person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law and the judgment of his peers.

Article III, section 17, provides for jury trial of criminal offenses.

Now, in connection with those constitutional provisions, that are so plain that he who runs may read, I desire to call your attention to the military order under which scores of men were tried and convicted, under which 2 men at least are now serving sentences in the penitentiary, and 8 or 10 more are confined in the county prison. Listen to the military order which created this court to try these cases in this State, whose people are protected by a constitutional provision that any departure from the constitution in time of peace or war "under the plea of necessity or any other plea is subversive of good government":

General Orders, No. 23.

The following is published for the guidance of the military commission organized under General Orders, No. 22, of this office, dated November 16, 1912:

1. The military commission is substituted for the criminal courts of the district covered by the martial-law proclamation, and all offenses against the civil laws as they existed prior to the proclamation of November 15, 1912, shall be regarded as offenses under the military law, and as a punishment therefor the military commission can impose such sentences, either lighter or heavier than those imposed under the civil law, as in their judgment the offender may merit.

In other words, this handful of militia officers, scions of the mighty stock of coal operators as some of them doubtless are—this little coterie of little men may, if they desire, under the provisions of that constitution, declare that a man who is guilty of larceny shall suffer death.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. KERN. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. By whom was this order, which the Senator has just read, issued?

Mr. KERN. It was issued by command of the governor, and signed "C. D. Elliott, adjutant general."

Mr. CHILTON. What is the date of it?

Mr. KERN. The date is not here. It was issued, however, after November 16, 1912.

Under this order, I repeat, these American citizens have been tried; under this order two of them were confined in the penitentiary. Those men thus confined in the penitentiary in West Virginia have been denied the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus by a majority of the supreme bench of that State.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. KERN. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from West Virginia some time ago remarked that something had been decided by the supreme court of that State. I should like to know whether the court of last resort of West Virginia has rendered a decision affirming the legality or the constitutionality of the order which the Senator from Indiana has just read?

Mr. KERN. I have just stated—and I have the opinion here—that a majority of the Supreme Court of West Virginia denied to these men in the penitentiary the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am very sorry to hear it. I have great respect for courts, but that is the most extraordinary thing I have ever heard in all my life.

Mr. KERN. I was about to say, Mr. President, that under the provisions of this order, signed by command of the governor by the adjutant general, a man or a woman charged with the most trivial offense might forfeit his or her life; and if there was judgment of forfeiture which went to the extent of depriving the citizen of life, under the decision of the majority of the Supreme Court of West Virginia there would be no redress, because they say the governor's power under a statute that has been enacted under the constitution of that State can not be questioned.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, may I ask one further question of the Senator from Indiana?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. KERN. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. Is the decision of the Supreme Court of West Virginia based upon the governor's power to suspend the right of the writ of habeas corpus, or is it based upon the lawfulness of the order issued by the governor of West Virginia?

Mr. KERN. It is based, as I understand, upon the lawfulness of the conduct of the governor in creating this military court, which found these men guilty and sentenced them to the penitentiary. I have not, however, read all of the order.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

Mr. KERN. If the Senator from California will allow me, I desire to finish reading this general order.

2. Cognizances of offenses against the civil law as they existed prior to November 5, 1912, committed prior to the declaration of martial law and unpunished will be taken by the military commission.

3. Persons sentenced to imprisonment will be confined in the penitentiary at Moundsville, W. Va.

By command of the governor:

C. D. ELLIOTT, Adjutant General.

Now I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, it was said by the Senator from Indiana that the decision of the court turned upon the validity of this particular order; but I suppose the court must have gone behind that to determine whether the governor had declared a state of insurrection to exist that would afford a basis for the issuing of an order of that kind. Is not that true?

Mr. KERN. Oh, I think so.

Mr. WORKS. Then, really, the question depends upon whether there was such a condition as to authorize the governor to declare the State, or a particular county of the State, in insurrection, and, based upon that, to issue the order, and thus to justify, or attempt to justify, the arrest and trial of those men. I do not see that there is anything so very extraordinary about that. The circumstances might not have warranted the order; I do not know; but certainly there is nothing extraordinary about it.

Mr. KERN. Speaking facetiously, I suppose it occurs every day in some State; but, speaking earnestly, I insist that such proceedings as are complained of in West Virginia have occurred in no other State.

Mr. CUMMINS. Assuming that there was a state of insurrection, and that the governor of the State properly declared it, the order that has just been read by the Senator from Indiana is entirely unwarranted. It could not, as it seems to me, be sustained under any circumstances. I do not know, and I never even heard, of the assertion of a power of that sort before.

Mr. KERN. Perhaps it ought to be stated, in this connection, that this military zone within which this military commission has jurisdiction was situate within the same county in West Virginia in which the capital of the State is situate, and it is conceded here, and it must be conceded everywhere, that at that time and at all times the courts in that county seat, which was the capital of the State, were open and able to execute and have had at hand sufficient power to execute the laws.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. KERN. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana has said that he has the decision of the Supreme Court of West Virginia at hand in this matter. If he has not already done so, I hope he will put the reference to it in the RECORD. I should like to read the decision and like to know where it is to be found. I suppose it is in one of the State Reporters. Being a recent decision, of course, I assume it is not in the bound volumes of the State Reporters.

Mr. KERN. It is in the present volume of the Southeastern Reporter, on page 243.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What is the date of the volume?

Mr. KERN. It is the current volume. I have not the date.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, unless it is too long, will the Senator from Indiana read the syllabus of the case?

Mr. KERN. The syllabus of the case is as follows:

The governor of this State has power to declare a state of war in any town, city, district, or county of the State, in the event of an invasion thereof by a hostile military force or an insurrection, rebellion, or riot therein, and, in such case, to place such town, city, district, or county under martial law.

* * * * * * * *

2. The constitutional guaranties of subordination of the military to the civil power, trial of citizens for offenses cognizable by the civil courts in such courts only, and maintenance of the writ of habeas corpus are to be read and interpreted so as to harmonize with other provisions of the constitution authorizing the maintenance of a military organization and its use by the executive to repel invasion and suppress rebellion and insurrection, and the presumption against intent on the part of the people, in the formulation and adoption of the constitution, to abolish a generally recognized incident of sovereignty, the power of self-preservation in the State by the use of its military power in cases of invasion, insurrection, and riot.

3. It is within the exclusive province of the executive and legislative departments of the Government to say whether a state of war exists, and neither their declaration thereof nor executive acts under the same are reviewable by the courts while the military occupation continues.

4. The authorized application of martial law to territory in a state of war includes the power to appoint a military commission for the trial and punishment of offenses within such territory.

5. Martial law may be instituted in case of invasion, insurrection, or riot in a magisterial district of a county, and offenders therein punished by the military commission, notwithstanding the civil courts are open and sitting in other portions of the county.

6. Acts committed in a short interim between two military occupations of a territory for the suppression of insurrectionary and riotous uprisings, and such in their general nature as those characterizing the uprising are punishable by the military commission within the territory and period of the military occupation.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. KERN. Yes; certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course, I do not want to break the continuity of the Senator's remarks, nor do I want to ask for the insertion of anything that he would not want to appear in the speech that he is making, but if he does not intend to ask unanimous consent that that decision may be incorporated in the RECORD I should like to ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD; if the Senator does not want it in his speech, at some other part of the RECORD, because I for one should like, and I think other Senators might like, to observe the course of reasoning pursued by the court.

Mr. KERN. There was a dissenting opinion by Judge Robinson, which is also here.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I would certainly want both the opinion and the dissenting opinion.

Mr. KERN. I shall be very glad to have them published in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. As a part of the Senator's remarks?

Mr. KERN. At the conclusion of my remarks.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Let them come in at the conclusion of the Senator's remarks, if he does not object. If there is no objection, I will also ask that the opinions be printed as a Senate document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the request?

Mr. JAMES. There will be no necessity for that.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, under that order another person, alluded to here the other day, was tried.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. KERN. Certainly.

Mr. BRYAN. Was the opinion of the court ordered printed as a Senate document?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has not yet been so ordered.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I should like to have a ruling upon the request. Was there any objection to it?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. JAMES. I do not imagine—although I would not object to the request of the Senator—that there would be any use for the paper as a public document. It looks to me as if it might be used by Senators merely to determine how they would vote upon this resolution, but I can not see that it would be of any use to the public generally to have the opinion printed, although I have no objection to that, if the Senator so desires.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I thought very likely it might be useful, Mr. President, and I thought there might be some demand for it. It might be more convenient in document form than in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. JAMES. I have none. Of course, that includes the dissenting opinion, because that would be of as much interest to the public, I imagine, as the majority opinion of the court.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Oh, certainly; I should want that printed by all means.

Mr. WORKS. There are more than one of these decisions, I understand.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It was only for the printing of one that I asked, I will say to the Senator from California, and that was the one of which the Senator from Indiana has just read the syllabus.

Mr. WORKS. There is another, a later decision, as I understand, involving these very same questions; and if the others are going to be printed, it seems to me that this ought to be printed also.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the Senator will make that request I shall not object.

Mr. WORKS. I have in my hand a copy of the decision in the case in re Mary Jones and others, a very interesting statement of the case and of the questions involved. The opinion is an important one, of course, and I suggest that both decisions be printed in the same document.

Mr. KERN. I have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the decisions referred to will be ordered printed as a public document. (S. Doc. 43.)

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I was about to say that under this order the old woman alluded to here the other day, familiarly known as Mother Jones, was tried. She was arrested last February by military order. She was imprisoned until some time in March, when she was tried by this military court-martial. Under the practice of the court-martial the officers constituting it made their finding and sent it to the governor for his approval. They made their finding last March, and they sent it to the governor some time in March. With that finding in his possession, its contents undisclosed, Mrs. Jones was kept in custody until about the time of the commencement of the discussion on this resolution the other day, and after the light began to be turned on here Mrs. Jones was taken under guard to the city of Charleston, where she had a conference with the governor of the State. After that conference, which was of no importance whatever, she was permitted to go unattended by a guard. She is now in Washington City, a free woman. So that, if this resolution does no other good in any other direction, it will have accomplished the liberation of this woman, who has been unlawfully imprisoned since last February.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Indiana whether or not anybody has any information as to what was the finding of this court-martial which was sent sealed to the governor?

Mr. KERN. Mother Jones will go down to her grave without knowing whether or not there was a finding that she should die or live. She only knows that she was arrested in the city of Charleston, carried into the military zone, imprisoned, and tried by these young militia officers, and then her imprisonment continued, as stated; she only knows that she was deprived of her liberty since last February, and that now she is free.

After reading the provisions of the fundamental law of West Virginia, which contain those safeguards by which it was thought that the liberty of the people of that State would always be held inviolate, and after reading this military order and reading the decision of the court, which strikes down the provisions of the fundamental law and upholds the governor in this unprecedented exercise of arbitrary power, is it remarkable that there are people, even in West Virginia, who believe in the doctrine of the recall of judges?

Mr. President, when Theodore Roosevelt last year in a speech at Columbus, Ohio, uttered those remarkable sentiments in favor of a recall of judicial decisions there was a sort of shudder of horror on both sides of this Chamber and at both ends of this Capitol, and the wiseacres of both political parties predicted that that declaration of Theodore Roosevelt would end his political career. Yet those of us who watched the progress of events were startled still more a little later when it became known that in those localities in which those utterances of his had been most strongly urged against him he received a greater vote than he received in other quarters where the question had not been discussed. That utterance of Theodore Roosevelt found such approval in the ranks of the Republican Party that when the election came in November he received a majority of the Republican votes in the Republic.

Mr. President, no doubt the doctrine of the recall of judges and of judicial decisions has gained ground immeasurably in the past five years; and why? Every such decision as that to which I have referred here to-day, written in the interest of hoarded wealth, striking down the liberty of the citizen, and abridging the rights of the common people, makes 10,000 converts to the doctrine of judicial recall and the recall of judicial decisions. I am not enamored of the doctrine; I have not been enamored of it; but, Mr. President, if decisions of this kind are to become common, if they are to multiply very much, if courts in the various States of the Union that enunciate such doctrines as these and undertake, as this decision does, to strike down the provisions of the fundamental law enacted for the protection of the people, then you may be sure that it will not be very many years until a vast majority of the people of this country who are interested in the problems of human liberty will be tempted to join the forces that declare that there resides in the great body of the American people the power to overcome such decisions, which are so subversive of popular rights.

I had a telegram the other day from a leader of socialism denunciatory of these conditions. When I showed it to a Senator here he deprecated the idea that there was such relationship between me and that man that he would feel free to telegraph me. Men are being imprisoned in West Virginia to-day because they are Socialists; newspapers are being suppressed because they teach the doctrines of socialism; men are discharged from mines, according to the testimony taken before the military commission, because they vote the Socialist ticket and because they belong to a labor union; and while the doctrine of judicial recall gains favor with the people whose rights are stricken down by unjust decisions, so do the forces of socialism multiply in such breeding grounds as those in parts of West Virginia, with special privilege on one hand eating out the substance of the people, and with judges setting aside constitutional safeguards to the end that the people may be oppressed and denied rights for which their fathers fought and died.

Socialism has grown in this country until more than a million men cast their votes for the Socialist ticket at the last election. The fire of socialism is fed by such fuel as this West Virginia decision, and the lawless action there of men charged with the execution of the laws. Socialism grows and will grow in exact proportion as wrongdoing is countenanced and upheld, not only by the strong legislative forces of the country, but especially when they are backed up by the judicial arm of the Government.

Senators, these million men who voted the Socialist ticket last November are the men who ought to be full of that kind of patriotism in time of war that would impel them to go out and walk on the uttermost ridge of battle, to peril their lives in defense of their country and their country's flag because they love their country, because they venerate the laws of the land.

This great body of a million or more men whose loyalty you question, and the millions more who make up the organized labor forces of the land, and who are not yet Socialists, will love their country and its flag if you will permit them, and not drive them away by making them constantly realize that they can not expect fair treatment either in the administration of the law by executive officers or in the construction and enforcement of law by the courts.

If the time comes—we all pray it may be averted—when the integrity of this Nation is assailed, either from within or from without—if the time comes when the American Republic is brought face to face with the marching armies of the nations beyond the sea, we will need those million of men, for they are men that toil with their hands. They have strong arms. They are the same type of men as that splendid Army of the Republic 50 years ago who won for themselves imperishable renown by their sacrifices in behalf of the Union and the flag.

Do you make good citizens of men by denying them their rights? Do you command the respect and the patriotism of the toilers of this land by turning them away when they come into this great tribunal and simply ask that the light be turned on, to the end that the people may know as to whether or not God reigns and the Constitution still lives, and whether they and their kind are to be despoiled of their heritage of liberty?

For a man to be a loyal, good citizen of this country he must love his country. Can you ask him to love his country and be true to her traditions and institutions when in his heart of hearts he knows that in this land and beneath its flag there is a law for him which is not enforced against others, and that he can no longer appeal to the courts for the enforcement of his constitutional rights?

Mr. President, the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], in his interesting address the other day, spoke of martial law and the wiping out of the right of trial by jury as being matters of little moment. He made this statement; I do not want to misquote him:

> But it is said we have martial law in West Virginia. Is that anything new in this country? Would it not be much better if in some localities where martial law has not been declared it had been proclaimed?
> Now, what is martial law? It is simply the rule of the military when the civil power is inadequate. That is all

Omitting a sentence or two, he proceeds:

> Would not a justice of the peace in this strike zone in West Virginia, the sheriff of the county, or the constable of the district make a lovely spectacle of himself in attempting to arrest two or three thousand riotous men? How long would the man stay under arrest with a thousand of his comrades to rush him from the officers of the law? How long would the courts stay open in that zone?

That question, Mr. President, doubtless presented itself to Gen. Washington at the time he interfered in the great whisky rebellion in the State of Pennsylvania. The example of Washington's conduct was referred to by President Garfield, I think, in the speech that he made in the Milligan case. He said:

> President Washington did not march with his troops until the judge of the United States district court had certified that the marshal was unable to execute his warrants. Though the parties were tried for treason, all the arrests were made by the authority of the civil officers. The orders of the Secretary of War stated that "the object of the expedition was to assist the marshal of the district to make prisoners."

Behold the difference between Washington's construction of the Constitution and that of the governor and the Supreme Court of West Virginia!

> Every movement was made under the direction of the civil authorities. So anxious was Washington on this subject that he gave his orders with the greatest care and went in person to see that they were carefully executed. He issued orders declaring that "the Army should not consider themselves as judges or executioners of the laws, but only as employed to support the proper authorities in the execution of the laws."

The military power of West Virginia—aye, the whole military power of the United States under the Constitution—would be brought to the aid of the humblest officer in West Virginia to enable him fully and effectually to perform his duty in the execution of the laws of the State and to carry out the mandates of the civil courts.

Mr. President, the sentiments of the Senator from West Virginia expressed upon this floor in defense of military law, military courts, and the exercise of arbitrary power in his State is in striking contrast with the language employed by Gen. Garfield in his great argument before the Supreme Court of the United States in the Milligan case. That great Republican statesman and soldier, fresh from the field of battle, within a year after the close of the Civil War, at a time when the blood of the soldier was still hot and the embers of civil strife still smoldering, appeared before that great tribunal, without fee or hope of reward, only because he loved his country and venerated its Constitution, and in one of the greatest arguments of his time, pleading for the supremacy of the civil over military law, said:

> Your decision will mark an era in American history. The just and final settlement of this great question will take a high place among the great achievements which have immortalized this decade. It will establish forever this truth of inestimable value to us and to mankind: That a republic can wield the vast enginery of war without breaking down the safeguards of liberty; can suppress insurrection and put down rebellion, however formidable, without destroying the bulwarks of law; can, by the might of its armed millions, preserve and defend both nationality and liberty. Victories on the field were of priceless value, for they plucked the life of the Republic out of the hands of its enemies; but
> "Peace hath her victories
> No less renowned than war."
> And if the protection of law shall by your decision be extended over every acre of our peaceful territory, you will have rendered the great decision of the century.

What a long step downward from the patriotic sentiments of Republican statesman Garfield to the recent performances of the Republican governor of West Virginia and the defense of that conduct on the floor of the Senate by the distinguished Republican Senator from that State.

The Senator from West Virginia, in the course of his remarks, was kind enough to refer to the "strike conditions" that prevailed in the State; and in the face of the fact, as it has been brought out here, that men can not belong to organized labor and work in the coal mines in that district, he says: "Mr. President, I believe in the rights of labor."

When I was a boy attending college in the State of Michigan, it was my privilege to hear a political speech made by Zachary Chandler, one of Michigan's great Republicans. It was in the presidential campaign of 1868. In the course of that speech Mr. Chandler used language something like this:

"Democrats talk a good deal about their rights. Fellow citizens, I recognize the fact that they have rights which they are entitled to enjoy, at least two rights—one a constitutional right and the other a divine right—a constitutional right to be hung and a divine right to be damned."

As I listened to the Senator from Virginia the other day and heard him first defend the arbitrary and unlawful acts of West Virginia's governors against the rights and interests of the working people of that State, and then declare that he recognized the rights of organized labor, I could not fail to conclude that he was as generous in his estimation of the rights of workingmen as Zachary Chandler was of the rights of Democrats in 1868.

Mr. President, I have detained the Senate much longer than I had intended. I introduced this resolution at the request of certain representatives of organized labor, without knowing more of the subject than that it had been introduced previously by the distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. I made no examination into the facts before I introduced the resolution, because I had such confidence in his integrity and patriotism that I felt sure he would father no resolution that had not sufficient basis to merit consideration. But, Mr. President, since the resolution was introduced, since the discussion commenced, I have received information from every quarter of the scene of the trouble, from many counties in West Virginia, and, as I said a while ago, from every part of the United States. I have received letters and telegrams by the thousand, asking that the Senate of the United States shall not permit this resolution to be sidetracked, demanding that this investigation take place. Within the last 24 hours I have received several telegrams saying: "What is the matter? What has become of the resolution? Have you permitted them to drive or persuade you from the line of action you have marked out?"

The people want to know. They have a right to know. As I said a while ago, if these coal operators in West Virginia are the men they claim to be, they ought to come forward as one man and say: "These charges that have been sent broadcast through the land are false charges, and we demand an opportunity to meet and disprove them." Instead of that, their voice is heard about here, first, in objection, and, second, in favor of referring this serious question to some committee of the Senate, in order that that committee may decide for us whether or not these questions ought to be investigated.

With the facts before this body, have you not information enough to justify action in ordering an investigation? The governor of West Virginia says that he desires it; that he would hail it with delight. The senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] says he will not go counter to the will of the governor in that regard. The public demands it. Every consideration of humanity demands it. I trust the Senate will not hesitate to yield to that demand.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, there is nothing novel or revolutionary about the proposition to have an investigation of industrial trouble by a committee of one of the Houses of Congress. In March, 1912, there were hearings before the Committee on Rules of the House of Representatives on the strike at Lawrence, Mass. No particular objection was made to the investigation. No report recommending action was made, but the facts were brought out, and they are now available in a public document. I believe there will not recur at an early day another situation such as occurred a year or more ago in Massachusetts. I think both sides will not go precipitately into another such conflict as we saw there.

I wish to occupy just a few moments to explain what I understand to be the real attitude of labor unions toward such conditions as are said to exist in the Paint Creek district of West Virginia.

Enough is conceded at the outset to warrant this investigation. It seems to be agreed that the miners went out on strike; that there was personal violence; that the governor felt warranted in suspending the civil authority; that men have been imprisoned for long terms through court-martial proceedings; that Mother Jones was detained against her will; and that military government to-day, contrary to accepted American institutions, exists within 20 miles of the capital of West Virginia and within 300 miles of the city of Washington.

It is claimed by the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], in a vigorous speech, that the Paint Creek district was dominated by a mob of striking workmen; that the civil authorities were unable to cope with the situation; and that it was necessary for the governor of West Virginia to place the district under military control and to suspend civil authority, including the rights of the writ of habeas corpus and of trial in the ordinary courts.

Mr. GOFF. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. HOLLIS. Certainly.

Mr. GOFF. Not for one moment has the writ of habeas corpus been suspended in West Virginia, nor did I ever intimate it.

Mr. HOLLIS. Then I will accept the correction, and will say that if by some technicality the writ of habeas corpus itself has not been suspended, the efficacy of the writ of habeas corpus, or the principles which we have all understood govern that proceeding, have been suspended.

I understood it to be conceded the other day by the learned Senator that nothing but a serious emergency would warrant the governor in placing a district under military control, but that he insisted that such an emergency did exist. It is claimed on the other side that no such serious emergency as would fairly warrant the governor in suspending the civil law existed in West Virginia. It is claimed that men are now being forced by the military authorities to work in the mines against their will. It is claimed that Mother Jones was detained without a fair trial and without knowing what the findings against her were. It is claimed that the resumption of government in West Virginia in accordance with American standards has been unduly delayed.

I believe, Mr. President, all reasonable men are fairly agreed upon the legal and ethical principles that should be applied to a situation like this. So far as I know, no one contends that a man has a right by violence to endeavor to advance the object of a strike. I have never heard a labor-union man claim the right to interfere by force with other workmen who wished to work, or to injure the property of his employer. I am well aware, however, that there have been frequent occasions when labor-union men have damaged property and when, by violence, they have prevented "scabs" from working, and when they have assaulted and injured such men.

I do not defend such violence. I am sorry when I hear of it, and I know the leaders of union labor disapprove of it as much as anybody in this Chamber. They understand that crimes against the law prejudice the public against their movement, and they know that such crimes interfere with the objects for which they are working. But violence is not confined to laborers who are out on strike. There have been deeds of violence in this very Chamber. A prominent banker of the city of Washington was brought before the bar of the House of Representatives only a few days ago for committing an assault upon a Member of that body. It is unfortunate, but it is true that violence is confined to no class.

When we are considering the rights and the temptations of striking laborers we have a great many things to take into account. They strike to obtain better wages, or otherwise to ameliorate the conditions under which they work. They do not strike lightly. They know that if strikes are protracted they and their families will suffer. They know that, no matter how long the strike is protracted, their employers will not suffer the pangs of hunger, will not go without any reasonable comfort, or even luxury.

I hope no Member of this body will ever sit at the bedside of a dying wife or child and know that that precious life is ebbing for lack of nourishing food or proper medicine, while he sits idle from lack of work. I hope I shall never be stirred to acts of violence by scenes like that. But I hope if I am so stirred I may be tried before a court that is established by the law of the land, and that I may be reasonably and properly punished according to the law of the land. It is conditions such as these that we should investigate.

I believe we all agree that military control is not desirable, although at times it is necessary. I believe we all agree that striking workmen ought not to resort to violence, but sometimes they do. I believe we all agree that the powers of the Government ought not to be used to help out capitalists in their struggles with organized labor, but should be used merely to preserve the law and to prevent violence. I think we all agree, Mr. President, that lawlessness on one side, and I care not which, begets lawlessness on the other side, and I think we all agree on the efficacy of publicity and of public opinion.

Now, then, with no practical dispute as to the legal principles involved, with little agreement on the facts involved, we are asked to investigate the facts, to apply legal principles so far as we may, and to ascertain whether government according to the usual American standard has been unreasonably suspended, and whether the constitutional rights to life, liberty, and property under due process of law have been unreasonably overthrown.

Mr. President, I understand that both the Senators from West Virginia agree with us that these rights are among the most precious that we have in this country, and that they ought to be maintained, if they can, whether we have the power or whether the power is somewhere else, in all their force and in all their purity. The gentlemen state, and I think they believe—I hope they believe and I take their word for it—that nothing wrong has gone on in West Virginia in the Paint Creek district on the part of the authorities. They ask us to believe it. But these charges come from responsible sources. The facts that are conceded here create grave suspicion at the very least, and what are we to do but to investigate? How are we to get at the real facts unless we investigate? How are we to decide whether we shall do something or do nothing until we are reliably informed?

The friends of labor unions ask for an investigation. The governor of West Virginia does not oppose it. I have sufficient faith in the power of publicity and of public opinion to be satisfied that nothing but an investigation by a committee of the Senate is needed to clear up what trouble exists there now and to prevent similar trouble for many years to come.

Mr. GOFF. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate for any length of time. We have heard many, many matters entirely foreign to this subject discussed here to-day. We have had very, very few of the facts really involved in this matter alluded to.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] in closing his interesting and very lengthy remarks tells us that he introduced this resolution without any information relating to the matter, and I want to tell him that he has proceeded to discuss it without having investigated many of the questions involved. The resolution is to-day, as it was when he presented it, quoad the facts and the law applicable thereto.

Now, it has been said that the governor of West Virginia does not oppose the investigation. I am delighted that he does not. He stands upon a pedestal before this country and before this Senate, and he is ashamed of nothing relating to his official life or pertaining to the situation now existing in West Virginia. Surely he will have no objection to an investigation, and it is plain that he has nothing to conceal.

But, Mr. President, is that any reason why the investigation should be made? He says, "I will welcome a committee of investigation. I will open the doors of the statehouse. I will throw wide the gates, and all the facts, all the information, we have will be at your disposal." It would not be like him, the State would resent it, were he to intimate anything to the contrary.

Take this matter home, each of you, to your own State. Would not your governor do and say the same thing? And yet would it follow, Mr. President, that on that account the dignity of the State of New York, of Ohio, of Indiana, or any other of the States of this Nation should be invaded in this manner? Wherein has West Virginia been derelict? It is so easy to talk, Mr. President; it is so easy to build up a fancied case, Munchausen-like theories illuminated by the Thousand-and-one Nights Tales, delightful, beautiful, but when you come down to the fundamental facts relating to the situation under consideration what do we find?

It is admitted that it is decidedly unpleasant to be confronted with conditions requiring the existence of martial law. No one has asserted to the contrary. There are not many States in the Nation that have not been subjected to the turmoil and confusion now existing in a small section of West Virginia. I could mention State after State where similar conditions have existed and where martial law has been declared; and though I alluded to and explained that matter a few days ago, still the Senator from Indiana to-day gravely insists that West Virginia is alone in that particular.

The case read by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], in which questions arising in the State of Colorado were reviewed, indicates that just such situations as now exist in West Virginia may call for martial law, may demand that in a certain zone military power shall be supreme. Has not the Supreme Court of the United States told us in substance that at certain times it is necessary that the military power shall be supreme? When and where? When the liberty of the people is in jeopardy, where insurrection prevails and the civil law is unable to cope with conditions then existing.

The argument we have heard here to-day relates to one side only. It is in the interest of men engaged in a controversy with their employers, involved in a "strike" in which they have substituted their will in place of law. Everything, according to the Senator from Indiana, must yield to their wishes, or the locality will be involved in confusion and riot. What comes to all the people who live in the vicinity where the strike exists and in the localities surrounding this distracted zone if the riot and confusion referred to are permitted to continue? They are reputable people—men, women, and children. They are engaged in the various avocations of life—farmers, merchants, miners, laborers; some of them operators of mines and men of means. Concede it, is that reprehensible? Does that deprive them of the protection of the law? They are the men who are developing and building up the country where they live. They have invested there large sums of money; they are employing thousands of men. Some are natives of that section; some are from Ohio, others from New York, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, and other New England States. They are conquering the wilderness.

A few years ago I stood on the summits of the mountains near that section that divide the tidewater on the east from the then unbroken forests to the west, and the view was majestic, inspiring, full of wondrous possibilities, fair to gaze upon, a primeval, unbroken wilderness, rich beyond description, and as grand a gift as a propitious Providence ever gave to the children of men.

Now they are developing it. They have established industries all through it. Is it not a pity that we can not build railroads, open mines, construct furnaces and ovens, or do those things that make the hum of industry sweet music to the ear unless we also have strife, confusion, riots, insurrection, bloodshed, and death?

Now, why not be fair about this matter? Why insist that West Virginia alone is so afflicted? Such incidents, such misfortunes, come to all sections. It is so in your locality; it is so in mine; it is so everywhere where human agencies are endeavoring to make improvements, to construct mills and factories, to operate mines, to do things. The men who are doing things want to do it their way, and the men who are doing the labor part of it want to do it their way. The result is contention, differences, strikes, and frequently riots and insurrection. We have that situation now in West Virginia. We have had it there before this; but this is the first time that the Senate has deemed it proper to propose an investigation. Strikes have existed in other States, resulting in martial law, but this Senate did not interfere, did not suggest investigation. I was tempted to ask the eloquent Senator from Idaho about a great strike in his State, in the beautiful region of Coeur d'Alene, where I happened to be when it was going on. The State of Idaho knew how to control it, knew how to settle it, and many other of the States of the Union have known how to handle and adjust the strikes, riots, and insurrections they have had to contend with.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. GOFF. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I do not take issue with the Senator from West Virginia upon the proposition which he has thus far stated; that is, the power of the governor to declare that an insurrection exists and to declare martial law. The point which it was difficult for me to solve without further investigation was the suspension of the right of trial of these men in civil courts.

Mr. President, I passed through the strike in the Coeur d'Alene. If I may be permitted to make a personal reference, in view of the Senator's reference, I was one of the attorneys who represented the prosecution in those cases; but it never occurred to us to try anybody by military tribunals, and we never had to do it.

Mr. GOFF. No?

Mr. BORAH. When the governor had declared martial law and policed the situation, we tried those men before a court and in the ordinary methods in which men are tried in times of peace. They were given a trial before a jury according to the usual course of procedure in such matters.

Mr. GOFF. I thank the Senator for his suggestions, and I will reach that point in my discussion of the West Virginia situation in a few moments. We had best discuss it as we develop the facts.

Now, then, this condition existed in West Virginia. The governor tried all means in his power to adjust it without resorting to military power. He appointed committees; he designated distinguished citizens. His action was nonpartisan. He asked a gentleman of the highest character of Republican faith, and a gentleman of equal dignity and character of Democratic belief. He put at their head one of the purest, grandest men in that or any other State, clean, upright, courageous, a disciple of the lowly Nazarene, now occupying the exalted position of bishop in the Roman Catholic Church—bishop of the diocese of Wheeling. Those three men went into this disturbed community, of which you have heard so much; they went there bearing with them the seal of the State on the commission of the governor; they took a solemn oath, and after due inquiry made a report of the situation to the governor. They went into the miners' homes. They did not find the wolf at their cabin doors. They advised with them; they heard and considered all complaints. They asked them what was the matter; they asked them in what particular they were mistreated; they asked them to state fully and freely their wishes. The miners did so. They welcomed this committee and talked with it freely. The complaints they submitted were fully considered. The committee then went to the operators, to the men who were conducting this great work to which I have alluded—the men who were opening up the wilderness, developing that section of West Virginia—heard their statements, and duly their grievances. "What is your grievance?"

Now, regardless of the slighting allusions of the Senator from Indiana to my regard for labor, I want to tell him, standing face to face with him, that such regard is just as honest, as true, and as conscientious as any that he has ever held or expressed at any time in his honored career toward laboring men or labor organizations.

If he will go into the localities in West Virginia where labor is employed, and where I have lived, he will find that the men who labor that they may live know me better than he does, and that they joined with the voters of my district in sending me to represent them at the other end of this Capitol. They know me, and I am willing to be judged by the record I have made.

Now, what was the report of that commission? In some particulars they found the miners to be correct, and that they should have the relief they asked for—such as the method of mining and weighing coal. It advised the executive that the miners were in the right and suggested that he sustain them in their insistence. He did so. It sustained the miners in their position that the mine guards should be abolished. The governor agreed with the commission; satisfactory terms of settlement were agreed to. Do you know that there is no trouble on Paint Creek to-day? Do you realize that there is no riot, no strike in the valley of Cabin Creek to-day? The end has come; it is a thing of the past. Gov. Hatfield suggested the terms of settlement and all agreed to them. He went to their homes; he broke bread with them; they appreciated him, and he sympathized with them. There was no guard with him; he mingled with them freely—this despot, this tyrant, this cruel commander in chief. He went in broad daylight, through the valleys and over the mountains of this martial zone, with a few personal friends, and everywhere was received as the honored man he is, not as a conquering lord, but as the beloved executive he is.

Now, as to the strike zone. At the time these troubles originated, as I have indicated, the situation was such, the difficulties so great, that the civil authorities were powerless, and you could as easily, with straw, have impeded the flow of the rushing waters of the Ohio during its recent flood as have maintained order in that section by its justices, its constables, and its sheriffs. Will it be right to go back; will it be profitable to seek for the original cause of this trouble? Cui bono? Still a cause existed. If I say the trouble arose because of strangers coming into that community, bringing with them orders from other localities, demands from lodges and associations, I will stir up somebody's bad blood. There were inflammatory addresses; there were such speeches and threats made—not appeals to reason; not fair discussion, but suggestions for riot and insurrection—as led to suspension of work, destruction of property, intimidation, violation of law, importation of arms for illegal use; in fact, chaos and death.

I hope we may never experience the like of it again. Let us have the seal of your disapproval now. It may come to you next. They call it the right of free speech. That we will never oppose. Never yet in any land of civilization has it been held that free speech means unlimited license; that it means permission to incite to riot, to advise insurrection, to suggest the violation of the laws.

Was the governor of that State, realizing that situation, to stand idly by? Thousands of men, armed and desperate, on mountain top and in valley, were ready for the fray. They were miners, workmen, agitators, owners of the properties guards, and citizens. Some were contending for the right to labor, others for the right to prevent some from laboring; some were defending their property, others were for destroying it unless they were given the right to control it.

The governor properly concluded he was powerless without the aid of the military organization. Did he not do right? Who will rise in the Senate and tell me he did not? The law of necessity impelled him to so act, and the statutes of West Virginia authorized him to do so. I will read it to you. It is not unusual:

When any portion of the military forces of this State shall be on duty under or pursuant to the orders of the commander in chief, or whenever any part of the State forces shall be ordered to assemble for duty in time of war, insurrection, invasion, public danger, any breach of the peace, tumult, riot, or resistance to process in this State, or imminent danger thereof, the Rules and Articles of War and the general regulations for the government of the Army of the United States shall be considered in force and regarded as a part of this chapter until said forces shall be duly relieved from such duty. No punishment under such rules and articles which shall extend to the taking of life shall in any case be inflicted except in time of actual war, invasion, or insurrection declared by proclamation of the governor to exist, and then only after the approval of the commander in chief of the sentence inflicting such punishment. In the event of invasion, insurrection, rebellion, or riot the commander in chief may, in his discretion, declare a state of war in the towns, cities, districts, or counties where such disturbances exist. (Acts 1897, ch. 61; sec. 92, ch. 18, West Virginia Code, 1906.)

You will not find anybody in West Virginia familiar with the circumstances who will not say to the governor, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant." He drew the line of martial law around just a small place, a small part of one county in the State. Let the Senate Chamber represent West Virginia, and this little desk will be the strike zone. Here is where martial law prevailed; here is where the military commission met; and in all the rest of the Chamber the civil courts would be in force, just as they have been for 50 years past, for all the time West Virginia has been a State.

It has been intimated here that the writ of habeas corpus was suspended. There has been a feeling engendered in this Chamber and throughout the country against the State of West Virginia based on just such reckless assertions as that. Such assertions should come from the lips of no man unless he knows whereof he speaks, because it is doing an injustice to as great, as free, and as gallant a people as ever drew the breath of life. Our mountaineers, you know, are always free. The motto "Montani semper liberi" is upon the seal of our State. The writ of habeas corpus has never been suspended. Those held in the martial zone availed themselves of it.

The case which the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] discussed and criticized here so severely, the case which he read and reread and relies upon, what was it? An application for a writ of habeas corpus, showing that such writ had not been suspended, demonstrating that it had not been refused. The writ of habeas corpus suspended! The books and records are full of cases showing where those who complained of the acts of the military commission petitioned the courts and the judges issued the writ, the military officials brought in the parties, the judges heard the cases and said: "We can not discharge you; go back to your prison; because according to the Constitution of the United States and the laws and constitution of West Virginia you are properly held by the military authority." That is what they said. Why can not West Virginia courts speak and be entitled to the same respect and be given the same credit that the courts of other States have and receive? I know those judges—the judges of the inferior as well as of the superior courts, including the judges of the court of appeals. They will stand in learning, in intelligence, and in dignity with any bench that wears the judicial gowns. Even if they are mistaken, why should they not have credit given them until in the lawful, orderly way their judgment is reversed? How are we going to maintain republican government unless we respect the judgment of the highest courts of the country?

I desire to quote from another decision, in addition to the case from which the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] read—the Milligan case—in which the Supreme Court held the military commission invalid because where it was held there was no insurrection. That was the ground of the decision in that case. The commission was not acting in the war zone; it was not sitting south of the Potomac; it was not in a section where disorder reigned supreme and the usages of war applied. Therefore the military commission had no right to sit or dispose of the question before it. Back in the years gone by, early, relatively, in the history of this Government, the Supreme Court of the United States laid down the rule that has prevailed in West Virginia through all this trouble. It reiterated it in the case from Colorado. I refer to the case of Luther against Borden, arising in the State of Rhode Island. What did the Supreme Court of the United States say in that case? I read from Seventh Howard, page 45:

And unquestionably a State may use its military power to put down an armed insurrection too strong to be controlled by the civil authority. The power is essential to the existence of every government, essential to the preservation of order and free institutions, and is as necessary to the States of this Union as to any other government. The State itself must determine what degree of force the crisis demands.

Let me reread that:

The State itself must determine what degree of force the crisis demands—

This decision was given by Chief Justice Taney, and was concurred in by some of the ablest judges that ever sat upon the Supreme Bench of this Nation—and if the government of Rhode Island deemed the armed opposition so formidable and so ramified throughout the State as to require the use of its military force and the declaration of martial law, we see no ground upon which this court can question its authority. It was a state of war, and the established government resorted to the rights and usages of war to maintain itself and to overcome the unlawful opposition.

Now, will you listen to this? Will the Senator from Indiana listen to this and see how much out of the way West Virginia has been and how great an outrage the governor of that Commonwealth has committed, or his military officials have been guilty of?

And in that state of things the officers engaged in its military service might lawfully arrest anyone who, from the information before them, they had reasonable grounds to believe was engaged in the insurrection, and might order a house to be forcibly entered and searched when there were reasonable grounds for supposing he might be there concealed. Without the power to do this martial law and the military array of the government would be mere parade and rather encourage attack than repel it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. GOFF. I do.

Mr. BORAH. The Supreme Court in the Milligan case in nowise modified that rule.

Mr. GOFF. No.

Mr. BORAH. And, so far as I know, no one here controverts that proposition.

Mr. GOFF. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. BORAH. I have not heard anyone do so.

Mr. GOFF. It has been stated over and over again that men and women were arrested without authority and detained without warrant of law.

Mr. BORAH. I have no doubt at all that the military authorities had the right to detain people and to arrest them for the purpose of preventing them continuing unlawful acts; but the question which that case does not reach, and which the Milligan case does reach, is the right, in addition to that, to try those parties before a military tribunal. As I understand, the people who were tried in West Virginia simply committed offenses against the laws of the State of West Virginia.

Mr. GOFF. Some of them; but not all of them.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; but they were tried before a military tribunal for the violation of the laws of West Virginia, when, according to the Senator himself, the State courts were open.

Mr. GOFF. Every one of them, except in this zone.

Mr. BORAH. And juries ready to be impaneled.

Mr. GOFF. I say the zone where this commission sat, and where these trials were held and where these offenses were committed, was without law and without courts.

Mr. BORAH. But, Mr. President, courts were open to which these people could have been taken, and their jurisdiction covered this particular territory.

Mr. GOFF. I concede you that military commissions are not new. Does not the Supreme Court, in the case from which I have just read, if the Senator from Idaho will recall, lay down the doctrine positively that the State may do those things necessary to protect the dignity of the State, the liberty of its citizenship, and the peace of the community?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, as I understand the law, it is that while you may arrest and detain parties from doing unlawful acts where martial law prevails, you may not try those people for the violation of civil law or for the violation of the laws of the State, unless they are themselves in the Army or the Navy, in any other wise than by the civil courts. Is there any decision to the contrary?

Mr. GOFF. There is this decision, under which they may arrest anyone found within this insurrectionary district that they believe is aiding the insurrection.

Mr. BORAH. And when they have arrested him, if they propose to punish him, they must punish him in accordance with the laws of the State or of the United States?

Mr. GOFF. I have just reached that point.

Now, we are in the military zone. Now, we are in this place where martial law has been declared and where the usages of war prevail.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly; but the military zone is still within the jurisdiction of the court.

Mr. GOFF. Its acts are subject to the revision of the court. Is it possible that we are to be told in this late day and generation that a military commission can not sit when war or insurrection is in progress in the identical spot where the insurrection is extant?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I declare at this late day that it has been declared so many times that I did not suppose it would be controverted that, although the governor of a State may declare martial law and fix a military zone for the purpose of policing the situation and preventing lawlessness, he can not improvise a military tribunal for the purpose of trying men who have violated the laws of the State.

Mr. GOFF. That raises the question again. Great men will differ. Great courts will differ.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I desire to interrupt the Senator from West Virginia for the purpose of asking him if it would not be more convenient for him to go on with his speech to-morrow after the Senate meets. It is now a quarter to 6 o'clock, and it seems to me that if the Senator will yield to permit an adjournment he can complete his speech better in the morning. I ask the Senator to yield for that purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. GOFF. I may be perfectly willing to accommodate the Senator from Mississippi if he can assure me that the situation to-morrow will be that which he indicates.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand the resolution goes over as the unfinished business and will come up in that shape to-morrow, when the Senator can continue his remarks.

Mr. GOFF. Then, will the Senator move an adjournment?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Mississippi that the Senate adjourn. [Putting the question.] The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. JAMES. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SHEPPARD (when Mr. CULBERSON's name was called). I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. CULBERSON] is necessarily absent. He is paired with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT].

Mr. BRYAN (when Mr. FLETCHER's name was called). My colleague [Mr. FLETCHER] is necessarily absent from the Senate. He is paired with the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN].

Mr. POMERENE (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA]. I understand if he were present he would vote "yea." That being the case, I will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. SAULSBURY (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Maryland was called). At the request of the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] I desire to announce his pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER].

Mr. RANSDELL (when Mr. THORNTON's name was called). I desire to announce, on behalf of the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON], that he is unavoidably absent on account of sickness.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when Mr. WARREN's name was called). I announce that my colleague [Mr. WARREN] is absent from the Senate on public business. He is paired with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to inquire whether the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The junior Senator from Pennsylvania has not voted.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am paired with that Senator. I am advised, however, that if he were present he would vote "yea." Therefore I am at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. GALLINGER. I was requested to announce that the Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] is paired with the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], and that the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] is paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON].

The VICE PRESIDENT. The cablegram will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

THE TARIFF.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair, for information, desires to make an inquiry of the Senators present.

The next order of procedure is messages from the House of Representatives on the table. As is known to the Senate, House bill 3321, commonly known as the tariff bill, has not been disposed of. It has not been referred to any committee as yet.

For the information of the Chair I should like to know where that bill is, whether it is a message from the House of Representatives still on the table which is now to be taken up and further discussed in reference to the motion to refer, or whether it is ever to be taken up again until some one takes it out of the air and brings it down and presents it to the Senate.

For the information of the Chair, if Senators who have knowledge of the mode of procedure will inform the Chair as to whether this is the time or not, he would be obliged.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, as I understand the Chair, the question is in regard to referring the tariff bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is whether under this particular order of business it is the duty of the Chair now to call the attention of the Senate to it.

Mr. LODGE. A case precisely of this kind I do not recall. A message from the House, which is the form in which the bill comes to us, is a privileged question to the extent that the message must be laid before the Senate on the request of any Senator or at the discretion of the Chair. But when it has been laid before the Senate the privilege is exhausted.

Now, the next step it appears is a new matter. It would seem to me by analogy that the question of the reference of the bill comes when the order of bills is reached in the routine morning business; that is, a bill for reference comes before the Senate properly at that time and must then be decided. I do not think it would shut out the ordinary morning business and prevent the presentation of petitions and reports of committees. I should think the question of reference would come up after the introduction of bills; but, as I said, I know of no case precisely like this, and that would be merely my judgment from analogy.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I have very great confidence in the judgment and experience of my learned friend. I should like, not by way of argument or controversy but for information, to have the Senator suggest upon what he bases the opinion that the privilege had been exhausted.

Mr. LODGE. The only privilege the bill has is the privilege that it is a message from the House. The rules provide that a message from the President or a message from the House may be laid before the Senate by the Chair at any time, and shall be laid before the Senate on the request of a Senator. When that is done, exactly like a conference report, the privilege is then exhausted; there is no further privilege.

Mr. BACON. The idea of the Senator is that it is then in the possession of the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. It is then in the possession of the Senate to take any action they please. They can take it up; they can raise the question of consideration, and refuse to consider it; but it has no privilege after the privilege of laying it before the Senate has been exhausted. A motion to refer has been made, and, of course, a motion can be made to take it up and dispose of it at any time.

Mr. BACON. Would not the Senator consider that the motion, made when the message was first laid before the Senate, is a privileged motion?

Mr. LODGE. No.

Mr. BACON. It was a part of the privilege.

Mr. LODGE. No; I do not think so.

Mr. BACON. Some disposition was to be made of it.

Mr. LODGE. The Senate could have refused to consider it; they could have refused to refer it. The Senate could have done anything with it they pleased. As a matter of fact, the motion to refer was made. That motion is open to debate. I think in the natural order of things it must come up automatically every morning after the order of bills, but I do not think that prevents moving that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the reference of the bill. That can be done at any time.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I was laboring under the impression that the Senate would not meet until 2 o'clock this afternoon, and I was not here at the opening of the session. I desire to inquire what motion is pending before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state, for the information of the Senator from North Carolina, that there is no motion pending. The Chair was inquiring for information in regard to the conduct of the Chair as to whether, under the order of messages from the House of Representatives on the table, it was either the duty or the power of the Chair now to lay before the Senate the motion made to refer to the Committee on Finance what is commonly known as the tariff bill with the amendment thereto.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I am under the impression, that being a House bill which has been laid upon the desk of the Vice President and a motion made to refer it, that would be a privileged motion, and it may be called up at any time during the morning hour.

The VICE PRESIDENT. By a Senator?

Mr. SIMMONS. By a Senator. I desire now to ask that that motion be laid before the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say to the Senator from North Carolina that the bill is only a privileged question to the extent that it shall be presented to the Senate. I agree fully with the Senator from Massachusetts on that point. But after a day has passed then it is no longer a privileged question, and it is in no other position than any other bill which may be on the calendar or any resolution or bill which may be on the table. The Senator from North Carolina, or any other Senator, can move to take it up at any time, just the same as if it were a bill on the table or a bill on the calendar.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is what I have just done.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator moves to take it up, of course it is in order.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is what I have done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. After the inquiry made by the Chair, the Chair is now of the opinion that it is the duty of the Chair to proceed with the regular order, and that at the conclusion of the regular order the Senator from North Carolina has a right to call for the further consideration of the bill.

Mr. LODGE. There can be no doubt of that.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I insist upon the motion. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the motion for the reference of the bill to the Committee on Finance.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is a motion on the part of the Senator from North Carolina. The Senator from North Carolina moves that the further consideration of the motion to refer what is commonly known as the tariff bill to the Committee on Finance be laid before the Senate with the amendments thereto. All in favor of that motion will say "aye." [Putting the question.] The "ayes" have it, and the motion is agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. I now move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from California.

Mr. PENROSE. Excuse me one moment. Of course the motion carries the amendments with it, or do they have to be separately acted on?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the question now pending before the Senate is upon the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], accepted by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], carrying instructions for the Committee on Finance to have open hearings upon the tariff bill when it is referred to that committee; and upon that the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] has the floor.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, when this motion was made and the amendment to it proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania it at once brought about a discussion——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. WORKS. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I asked the Senator from California to yield to me for the purpose of seeing whether it is not possible to agree upon an hour to take the vote upon this motion to-day.

Mr. WORKS. Certainly, Mr. President, I yield for that purpose.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I suggest that we vote upon the motion, say, not later than 5 o'clock this afternoon. I think that will give ample opportunity for debate on each side.

Mr. LODGE. At what hour?

Mr. SIMMONS. Not later than 5 o'clock.

Mr. SMOOT. That is all right.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there unanimous consent to that proposition?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I should like to ask, before that is acted upon, what will become of the unfinished business—whether, if the unfinished business should be taken up at 2 o'clock——

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. And proceeded with, that may not take out three hours of the time?

Mr. LODGE. I take it the Senator from North Carolina means that the day is to be given to the question of reference, and that that question is not to be set aside at 2 o'clock.

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, no. I shall insist upon the continuous consideration of this matter until we can definitely act upon it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I suppose the understanding is that the unfinished business will be laid aside?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Unless that is a part of the unanimous-consent agreement——

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask that that be a part of the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. KERN. Will that displace the unfinished business?

Mr. SIMMONS. The unfinished business can be informally laid aside at 2 o'clock. I hope the Senator from Indiana will not interfere with this proposed agreement.

Mr. KERN. With the understanding that the resolution is to remain the unfinished business——

Mr. SIMMONS. There is no purpose to displace the unfinished business.

Mr. KERN. Very well. With the understanding that the resolution is to remain the unfinished business, I shall not object.

Mr. LODGE. As I understand it, the request of the Senator from North Carolina is that the vote shall be taken not later than 5 o'clock to-day on the pending motion to refer, and that it is also understood that at 2 o'clock the unfinished business shall be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That it shall be temporarily laid aside, and that this question shall be the continuous business until 5 o'clock, if it is not until then disposed of.

Mr. PENROSE. Unless sooner disposed of.

Mr. SIMMONS. That it is to be continuously discussed, unless disposed of before 5 o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I object.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then, one additional inquiry. Will the Senator from Michigan suggest any time at which he would agree to take a vote?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No, Mr. President. This matter is so important, and the attitude of the other side is so arbitrary——

Mr. SIMMONS. This is a mere matter of the reference of the bill to the committee, Mr. President.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The attitude of the other side is so arbitrary that I do not feel that it calls for any special generosity upon the part of Senators on this side of the Chamber. I do not mean by that to suggest——

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to say to the Senator from Michigan that I am not asking for any generosity from that side of the Chamber. I was merely asking whether Senators on that side of the Chamber were willing to agree to a time certain for a vote on this question in the interests of the public business.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] has objected.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to disclaim any purpose to appeal to the generosity of Senators on the other side.

Mr. WORKS. I call for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There seems to be objection, and the unanimous-consent agreement is not entered into. The Senator from California has the floor.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, when this motion was originally made and the amendment to it offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], it brought about a discussion here of some of the merits of one of the provisions in the tariff bill. The discussion was not necessarily called for, and was really not appropriate to the mere question of reference, but it did bring about some statements, particularly by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], that I can not allow to pass even at this time without laying before the Senate some of the facts so far as they relate to the State of California.

It was stated by the Senator from Colorado that in that State the sugar-beet growers were paying their employees from 20 to 22 cents a day. I was sure at the time the statement was made that the Senator from Colorado was mistaken, and that he would eventually discover that fact and make the proper correction. He has already done so; but in correcting that statement he has made the further statement that the wages paid in Colorado are a dollar and a half a day.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. WORKS. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. My recollection is that the statement was not limited to any particular sum, but that the wages were from a dollar and a half to two dollars a day. I may be in error, but that is my recollection.

Mr. WORKS. Well, let that be as it may, even with that qualification it does not meet the facts as they exist in my State.

The further question was raised here as to the kind of labor employed, it being insisted by the same Senator that foreign labor was employed in the beet fields of all of the Western States. I was not able to say at the time certain inquiries were directed to me what the facts were with respect to that matter; but it seems to be the impression of some people that it is a positive offense to employ foreign labor in this country. We have invited these people here; they are rightfully in this country; they have a right to employment where their services are needed; and, so far as the State of California is concerned, we would rather employ these foreigners and pay them reasonable and decent wages than to see them go into the slums of the city and become thieves and assassins. We do employ foreign laborers in our State. They are employed in the work that is done in the beet fields, the same as in other lines of employment, especially on the farm, but we do not pay them foreign wages. They are paid the same wages that are paid to others. We are trying in that way to elevate the citizenship of these people who have come into this country as immigrants, so that they may be good American citizens in the end.

Of course, we have had rather thrust upon us some foreign labor that is objectionable to our people. That can not be helped.

There was a further question raised here, and that was as to the profits that are being realized in the manufacture of sugar in the State of California, and one of the manufacturing plants in that State was singled out, and the statement made that it had realized 100 per cent profit. That statement has been made for several years past. It has been repeated and repeated time and again after it has been conclusively disproved by men who have perfect knowledge on the subject. When this question as to the amount of wages that are paid in my State was raised, I telegraphed to the secretary of the Beet Growers' Association of California to ascertain what wages were being paid in that State, and I have this answer from him:

Workers in beet fields receive an average of $2.50 per day.

As to the general situation, including the wages paid, I have a letter here from Mr. F. B. Case, manager of one of the beet-manufacturing establishments in the State of California, which I will ask to have read by the Secretary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA SUGAR CO.,
Santa Ana, Cal., April 15, 1913.

Hon. JOHN D. WORKS, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of your favor of the 9th instant requesting me to forward to you a statement showing the profits made by this company for the last three or four years. In compliance therewith I inclose herewith copies of the sworn statements of this company made to the collector of internal revenue for this district, together with statement prepared by us and distributed among our stockholders.

In connection therewith I desire to bring to your attention the fact that in the statement made to the Government there has been a charge for 10 per cent depreciation annually, while in the statement to the stockholders no charge for depreciation had been made. This statement is made for our annual stockohlders' meeting of the business of each year.

We have been in operation four years. Out of the profits during that period we have been able to pay three 10 per cent dividends. The balance of our earnings we have been forced to put back into our plant to keep it in repair and up to date. This is the tenth year that the writer has engaged in the sugar business, having been prior to 1909 manager of the St. Louis Sugar Co., of St. Louis, Mich. At the time I left there the St. Louis Sugar Co. enjoyed the reputation of being the most profitable sugar factory in the United States. During my connection with that company we paid annually to the stockholders a dividend of 12 per cent. The business was conducted solely in the interest of its stockholders, and every dollar and penny available for that purpose was used for paying dividends. Since coming to California I have made a success of the business of this factory, and it has been conducted with that end in view the same as the St. Louis Sugar Co., to wit, payment to its stockholders of as large a dividend as possible in order that their investment might be profitable.

This company was the first one in California built and conducted upon the policy of purchasing its beets from growers. All other factories had been located upon lands donated or partly donated for the purpose of inducing their construction. The success of our company in this community drew to Orange County three other companies, to wit, the Holly Sugar Co., of Huntington Beach; the Anaheim Sugar Co., of Anaheim; and the Santa Ana Cooperative Sugar Co., of Santa Ana, with the effect that the assets accruing to this company by reason of its favorable location have been dissipated by overcompetition. This overcompetition forced the price of beets to advance 75 cents per ton last year with the resulting loss of profit.

The past year has taught us that it is not a question of factory profits, but the preservation of the business that is involved in the reduction of the tariff on sugar. While I am not fully posted in regard thereto, I believe that the profits of the St. Louis Sugar Co. and of the Southern California Sugar Co. upon the capital invested exceed that of all others. Were the profits as enormous as the misrepresentations have made them, there would be no difficulty in getting capital to extend the industry and build more plants.

The enormous profits to which you have referred are found in the testimony of Claus Spreckels, of the Federal Sugar Refining Co., who stated before the Hardwick committee that his father had informed him that the profits of the Watsonville plant, located at Watsonville, Cal., were for the two years of 1888 and 1889 enormous—12 per cent and 80 per cent upon its capitalization. The refutation of that statement, which gave the actual profits at the Watsonville factory for those two years as $11,075.38 and $23,550.23, respectively, has been smothered by the promulgation of the falsehood as to the enormous profits. This refutation is found on pages 2682, 2683, 2684, and 2686, respectively, of the record of the Hardwick hearings. Besides this refutation the Watsonville factory closed its doors and is now dismantled, the latter fact refuting the possible presumption that it had made such enormous profits.

There was also another reference made by the discredited Mr. Lowery as to the profits of the Union Sugar Co. at Betteravia. The statement of Mr. John L. Howard, on page 685 of the hearings, and statements submitted to the Committee on Finance of the United States Senate of the Sixty-second Congress, he being president of that company, on page 690, is: "So that instead of the carefully misrepresented dividend of 100 per cent, we find an average dividend of the Union Sugar Co., resulting from its sugar business during the first 12 years of its existence, of 6 per cent per annum in cash and 5½ per cent in stock." The Union Sugar Co. is idealy located; they own most of the land from which their beets are produced, the balance they are enabled by reason of their isolation to purchase at a much less price than the sugar factories which have competition. I believe the two instances mentioned above are the only ones cited as showing the enormous profits of the beet-sugar business, and I would state from my own experience that I do not believe such profits are possible even in an abnormal year of high prices.

Mr. Howard, with whom the writer is well acquainted, informed me that at no time in any year have the profits of their business per pound of sugar equaled that of the tariff levied. On pages 3964 and 3965 of the hearings of the Hardwick committee, in the statement of Mr. Rithett, president of the California and Hawaiian Sugar Refining Co., you will find an estimation of the character of Mr. Claus Spreckels as stated by a man who knew him.

In connection with the profits of the St. Louis Sugar Co. and the Southern California Sugar Co., before referred to, I desire to further bring to your attention the fact that both these companies are capitalized at small amounts, the St. Louis Sugar Co. at $400,000 common stock and $40,000 preferred stock, making the total capitalization at $440,000. The Southern California Sugar Co. is capitalized at $500,000, while our original investment was $600,000, we having given a $100,000 mortgage, payable in five years in equal annual payments. Of the latter we have from our earnings paid off $60,000.

Mr. J. Ross Clark, vice president of the Salt Lake Railroad, and one of the owners and managers of the Los Alamitos Sugar Co., advises me that he does not consider a 10 per cent depreciation annually high enough. Each beet-sugar factory requires a large amount of machinery and is operated night and day through its manufacturing season, and the wear and tear upon the machinery and the perishable nature of the products dealt with make the amount of repairs each year high. If we are to keep pace with the improvements in other countries, we are compelled to make the necessary changes in machinery and the accompanying alterations in the plant. The object in view of all sugar factories is to reduce the cost of production.

The destruction of the beet-sugar factories in this country, which I believe to be inevitable if the Underwood bill or any free-trade measure on sugar is put through, will financially ruin people who, like myself, have invested their all therein. There are many small stockholders who have invested their savings; while not being ruined, they will incur losses which they can ill afford.

We in California could, if the industry were allowed to expand to its possible limits, produce all the beet sugar consumed in the United States. With the threatened tariff legislation and the uncertainty of the profits, we are not able to induce capital to invest in new enterprises and we are meeting with difficulties in financing those now in operation. None of the factories, so far as I know, have a surplus sufficient to conduct its own business without recourse to the banks for temporary loans during the manufacturing season. Our raw product—the beets—is our largest item of expense; they must be received and worked up at the proper time or they will spoil, and the farmers must be paid, and for that reason we require a large amount of money during the campaign operations, which would be idle the balance of the year if the companies were capitalized with working capital. Although our stock issue represents the amount of money invested in our plant, we require approximately an equal amount to carry on the business, which we obtain from banking sources. Those sugar factories which were built in California prior to 1909 and which own their own land or a large part of the lands from which they obtain their raw material, can possibly live with a lower rate of duty than those factories which buy their beets from the ranchers, as the former factories, and thereby save the profits which go to the growers. The destruction of the business of the latter factories will not only injure the stockholders of the company, but it will work equal and greater injury to these landowners who are in possession of soils upon which beets are the only profitable crop. Thousands of acres of alkali land before the introduction of beet culture were used for pasturage for sheep and cattle are now turned into profitable crop-producing lands, while there are some that have become subdued, or partially subdued, and some small crops may be raised thereon. There are others which would go back to their original state.

This season has been exceedingly unfavorable for alkali lands, and many acres have been lost and will this year become unproductive by reason of the destruction of the beet crop by the alkali.

I regret exceedingly—and I am joined by other people engaged in the sugar industry—that you did not return to California last summer. We had planned to give you an extensive trip, and show you the industry and what it means to those who are connected with the factories as well as those whose business and prosperity depend on their successful operation.

Through the industry we have converted sections which were known as swamps into veritable gardens in appearance, free from weeds and showing the effect of careful farming. If you could know the conversion of abandoned and uncultivated lands into utilized and productive farms, and the upbuilding of villages and cities resulting from the prosperity that has been wrought in California by the beet-sugar factories, I know that you would be with us in hearty opposition to any act or measure that would tend to retard or injure its continuation.

Aside from the factories and farmers' interests in the industry, and not second to either, is the matter of wages to the common laborer. Here in California the most of the farm labor is done by Mexicans, with a sprinkling of Japanese and East India Hindus; although most of these people are foreigners, they receive the American scale of wages. Last year, in 1912, laborers being scarce, these men were paid from $2.50 per day up. The effect of these good wages upon the Mexican laborers in the past four years has been marked; they dress better, take better care of themselves, and are more orderly than formerly. It is unfortunate that we have no white laborers who will do this work; but there is almost a total absence of this class of labor in this part of California. Take it in the Middle States—in Michigan to Colorado—this hand labor is done by the farmers, their families, or school children. It has been slurringly referred to as degrading work, but I have never been able to see anything in the work performed that could be considered degrading or lowering in any way. The beets are thinned by people working on their hands and knees; consequently children can do that work better than grown people.

In those communities where there is not sufficient local help to perform that work the factories have gone to the cities and employed families to come to the fields to work. These latter generally consist of Europeans—Russians, Austrians, Bohemians, and Belgians.

There is another factor entering into the beet-sugar business which affects alike the factory and the beet grower. The character of the beets is a matter over which the man raising them has no control, for a man may keep his field clean and in good shape, thereby increasing the tonnage, but he can not in any manner control the quantity of sugar in the beets or the purity of the beet itself. By purity of the beet we mean the relation of sugar to the total amount of solids in the juice of the beet. A good beet should be of 83 per cent purity, and any beet below 80 per cent purity is a poor beet. The foreign solids in the juice consists of salts and acids; when they are relatively high they prevent the sugar of the beet from crystallizing. In order that I may make myself clear, I will state that from a beet of 85 per cent purity it is possible to extract 80 per cent of sugar, but of a beet of 80 per cent purity it would be difficult to obtain 70 per cent of sugar in granulated form. If, as is occasionally the case, the purity of the beets is very low and it is a matter of climatic conditions or the soil, the factories will operate at a loss, whereas if the beets are of high purity the factory will be able to obtain a large extraction and make profits, irrespective of the price of sugar, which may be relatively low. Our profits are all made from the amount of sugar crystallized over and above the amount necessary to cover the cost of the beets and the cost of manufacture. If from beets testing 18 per cent sugar 260 pounds of sugar are obtained, the factory has paid the grower the price fixed upon of the amount of sugar in the beets, to wit, 360 pounds, whereas the factory has obtained but 260 pounds. The balance of 100 pounds is either a factory loss and has gone into the sewer or has become part of the molasses. Low purity means low extraction and a large quantity of molasses, while high purities are susceptible to high extraction.

The writer has been informed that the reason the Watsonville plant closed down was due to the fact that the beets raised by the growers were of such low purity that the elder Mr. Spreckels refused to accept and pay for them at the contract price, and made the growers stand the whole loss. They therefore refused to grow beets for his plant and compelled them to close it down, it since having been dismantled.

We here in California generally have from year to year a uniform summer climate, but there have been instances of early rains when a quantity of beets would deteriorate very rapidly and were at the end of the campaign worked at a loss. The character of the beets raised will often vary materially in a small area. The writer experienced one year in St. Louis in which the beets grown for that factory were of such inferior quality that we were able to extract a small amount of sugar, and only by reason of the high price of sugar were we able to escape a serious loss, while at the same time the Saginaw factory, located 30 miles to the east, harvested their best crop of beets known in the history of the institution.

The Holly Sugar Co., the writer was informed by its former manager, Mr. Wiley, having two plants, one located at Holly and one at Swink, in Colorado, in a locality known for its high quality of beets, after their plants were built the quality of the beets raised were so low that they operated a number of years at a loss. If our banner years are taken and the tariff based upon the results from operation during such periods, we may any year meet with such serious losses as to cripple, if not destroy, the operating company.

If there is no factor of safety permitted by the adjustment of the tariff, there can be no extension to the industry nor any assured life to the plants now in existence.

The writer has requested Mr. Palmer to assist you in every way possible in furnishing data and information concerning the sugar industry in other countries and in laws enacted for the upbuilding and preservation of the same.

Very respectfully,

F. B. CASE.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, the letter that has just been read to the Senate is a private letter. It was not written to be used in the Senate, and the writer of it had no knowledge that it would be used for that purpose. I have been endeavoring on my own account to satisfy my own mind on the subject and to ascertain what the facts are that are partially disclosed in this letter.

I have here another letter bearing upon the same subject and procured in the same way. It is from Mr. E. W. Mayo, who is manager of the Domestic Sugar Producers. I will ask to have this letter printed as a part of my remarks. I do not care to take up the time of the Senate by reading all these letters.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless there is objection, that will be the order. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 30, 1913.

Hon. JOHN D. WORKS,
United States Senate.

DEAR MR. SENATOR: The proposal to remove the duty on sugar involves the infliction upon the Western States of losses far greater than are to be measured by the destruction of their rapidly growing sugar-beet industry. The results already obtained prove that this crop is particularly well adapted to cultivation on the reclaimed land of these States, and the extinction of sugar-beet culture will deprive this whole territory of one of the most fruitful agencies for its rapid and prosperous development. In this connection we take the liberty of calling certain facts to your attention.

The last census showed that the 11 westernmost States had increased 66.83 per cent in population within the last decade, as compared with the average increase of 21.6 per cent for the entire country.

The greater proportionate increase in the Western States is largely due to the rapid advance made in irrigation through private and governmental agencies. In the Pacific Coast States great tracts of land formerly used for ranching or grazing purposes are now being subdivided and brought under intensive cultivation in orchards, vineyards, alfalfa, sugar beets, and other crops.

The United States Reclamation Service, only yet in its infancy, has 25 great irrigation projects either complete or in course of construction. When fully completed these projects alone will bring over 3,000,000 acres under a high state of cultivation, an area larger than the improved lands of New Jersey or of Massachusetts. It must also be remembered that 1 acre of this irrigated land has a productive power of double the area of the best nonirrigated lands in other sections of the country. The possibilities of agricultural development in the great West are almost limitless, provided an outlet can be found for such products as can profitably be grown under intensive cultivation, subject to high marketing charges.

The opening of the Panama Canal and the great exposition to be held at San Francisco in 1915 doubtless will attract many thousands of people toward the West. The canal will also provide new facilities for the immigration of agricultural classes from the Old World. Already, it is said, arrangements have been made for the transportation of large numbers of people from the shores of the Mediterranean to the Pacific coast.

The one great problem in connection with the development of the West is transportation to the great consuming centers of the East. Local consumption of general farm and garden products must necessarily be limited for many years, except in the vicinity of the large Pacific coast cities. An export crop must therefore be produced—one that will find a ready market at destination. Thousands of acres are going into fruit, from the citrous groves of California to the apple orchards of the Northwest. Where is the market to be found for this increasing production? Surely there is a limit to the amount of fruit that the American people can consume. Even last year saw an overproduction of the apple crop of Washington and Oregon. Furthermore, with the proposed heavy cut in tariff rates, the products of the California groves will come into direct competition with the cheap importations from the Mediterranean, Cuba, and other tropical and semitropical countries.

The one great staple for which there is a constantly expanding market is sugar. The United States imports at the present time nearly 2,000,000 tons of sugar per annum from foreign countries, practically all from Cuba. Sugar is a staple for which there is always a market, and, if necessary, it can be stored for long periods with little deterioration. Furthermore, beet sugar is a finished product representing only about 15 per cent of the weight of the raw material from which it is produced; whereas in the case of fruit, alfalfa, and grain crops high freight charges to the eastern markets must be paid on the entire weight of the commodity just as it comes from the orchard or the field.

It has been demonstrated by years of experience that no section of the United States, in fact, no country in the world, is better adapted to the cultivation of the sugar beet than are the irrigated lands of the West. The production of sugar beets under irrigation for the first time in the world's history was commenced in Utah in 1891, and so successful has it been that 70 per cent of the total beet-sugar output of the United States is now produced in the Western States under irrigation.

It has been demonstrated also that the cultivation of sugar beets in rotation with alfalfa and grain crops increases the yield of the latter to such an extent as to make the production of cereals profitable even with the high cost of irrigation. The result is that while few new beet factories have been built within the past five years, the beet acreage has increased 25 per cent, and in some localities the factories have been compelled to turn away contracts for beets.

If sugar is placed on the free list, either now or three years hence, as proposed, it will give the eastern cane refiners, who import and now pay duty on their raw material, the absolute power to depress prices below the cost of the production of sugar beets as well as Louisiana cane. This they are anxious to do, as they are all alarmed at the encroachment of beet sugar in the eastern markets. For several months of each year, when beet sugar comes on the market, these big refiners either have to reduce the price of refined sugar or withdraw from the trade altogether until the beet sugar is disposed of, all of which tends to the lowering of prices to the consumer.

Free sugar in three years will be just as effective a death warrant for the domestic sugar industry as though the execution took place immediately, the only difference being that more time is allowed for the funeral arrangements. While the cost of production is gradually decreasing, and would further decrease with a large output, three years will make no appreciable difference under existing conditions. At the present time the eastern refiners are utilizing less than half the productive capacity of their plants, and it will be a simple matter for them to deal a death blow to the domestic production of sugar, as they will have the assurance of an absolute monopoly as soon as the domestic industry is annihilated.

In order that the beet-sugar industry may expand and become a greater factor in the development of the West new factories must be built. The beet growers themselves, as a rule, are pioneers, and whatever capital they possess is required in the improvement of their lands. Outside capital can not be secured for the erection of large factories after free sugar has given the eastern refiner a monopolistic control of market conditions. The inevitable result will be not only the abandonment of many of the present factories, but it will be the death knell of future expansion. This will mean that the thousands of acres now in beets, and which would be planted in beets in the future under conditions permitting this industry to expand, must go into fruit, alfalfa, and other general farm products, and will result in glutting a market already on the verge of oversupply.

The great fight for supremacy between the eastern cane refiners on the one side and the domestic producers of sugar on the other is now on. Those responsible for tariff legislation have it in their power to say whether the industry shall expand into one of the greatest factors in the upbuilding of the West, stimulated by immigration through the Panama Canal, or whether it shall be throttled and stagnation take the place of progress in a vast domain where the future holds so much of promise.

Respectfully, yours,

DOMESTIC SUGAR PRODUCERS,
E. W. MAYO, Manager.

Mr. WORKS. I also ask to have printed, without reading it, another letter, written by the secretary of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Sacramento, Cal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless there is objection, the request of the Senator from California will be granted. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF SACRAMENTO,
Sacramento, Cal., May 1, 1913.

Hon. JOHN D. WORKS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of April 7 asking me our opinion regarding the effect a reduction on the sugar tariff to 1 cent would have upon the industry of California has been received.

In reply permit me to submit the following: The full duty on 96° sugar is 1.685 per 100 pounds. Most of the duty-paying sugar into the United States, however, comes from Cuba, which by reason of our reciprocity that country takes a preferential duty of 20 per cent less, 0.3370. Therefore on nearly all duty-paying sugar into the United States (96° sugar) there is a duty of 1.3480 per 100 pounds or $26.96 per ton.

Under present market prices the California beet-sugar factories must figure their results about as follows:

To-day's price, duty paid, at New York and New Orleans for 96° raw cane sugar (Cubas) is per 100 pounds	$3.39
Add difference between raw and refined (being manufacturers' cost and profit), say	.75
Price of cane, New York or New Orleans	4.14
Add freight, New Orleans to Missouri River	.33
Price for cane sugar, Missouri River	4.47
Deduct difference between cane and beet	.20
	4.27
Less 2 per cent	.0854
Price for beet sugar, Missouri River	4.1846
Now deduct freight from Pacific coast points to Missouri River	.55
Leaves to-day's net price realized f. o. b. factory in California	3.6346

It therefore follows that if the tariff is reduced to 1 cent and 34 cents must be deducted from the net received by a California factory, then all they can expect to realize would be, say, 3.29, which is below the average cost at present, and which cost can only be further reduced by economy in the field and the perfecting of methods of agriculture and irrigation, all of which is in training and will finally result.

It could be argued that the present market prices for sugar are very low, but the man does not live that can forecast future values, dependent upon the law of supply and demand and the speculative position of the controlling markets, which continue to be Hamburg and London.

It therefore follows that any reduction in tariff is to the detriment of the beet-sugar plants and the development of the industry—sure to be injurious to the farmer and to the labor employed. To the students of economics it must be apparent that the way to reduce sugar to the consumer is to produce the consumption and then let competition do the rest.

Yours, very truly,

S. GLEN ANDRUS.

Mr. WORKS. Since this discussion was entered upon there has come into my hands a printed pamphlet entitled "Cost of producing sugar in the United States, Germany, Austria-Hungary, Russia, and Cuba." The compilation is by Mr. Truman G. Palmer, who, as is well known, has given great attention to this subject. In a brief way I wish to call attention to some of the information contained in the pamphlet.

On page 6 this statement appears:

The average price paid to farmers for beets in the United States, as given in the April issue of the Crop Reporter, issued by the Department of Agriculture, was $5.50 per ton in 1911 and $5.82 per ton in 1912. Direct reports from 65 factories show an average freight charge on beets paid by the factories of 43 cents per ton in 1911, 45 cents in 1912, and 41 cents per ton for agricultural expenses in 1911, 38 cents for 1912.

Thus the average cost of beets laid down at the factory gates in the United States was $6.34 per ton in 1911 and $6.65 in 1912.

Then follows a tabulated statement of the farmers' receipts for raw material. It shows that the farm price per ton of 2,000 pounds is in the United States $5.82; Russia, $3.90; Austria-Hungary, $3.68, and Germany, $4.14; and the average extraction of the beets is in favor of the European countries. In the United States it is 264.41; it is 316.98 in Russia; in Austria-Hungary, 315.20; in Germany, 328.30; and the average farm cost of 100 pounds of sugar is in the United States $2.20; in Russia, $1.23; in Austria-Hungary, $1.16; and in Germany, $1.26.

The table is as follows:

Farmers' receipts for raw material.

	Farm price of beets per 2,000-pound ton.	Average extraction of raw sugar per 2,000-pound ton of beets, 1907–1911.	Average farm cost of 100 pounds of sugar in the beet.	United States farm cost per 100 pounds of raw sugar in the beet in excess of cost in other countries.
United States	$5.82	264.41	$2.20	.....
Russia	3.90	316.98	1.23	$0.97
Austria-Hungary	3.68	315.20	1.16	1.04
Germany	4.14	328.30	1.26	.94

In another table following this is another statement that should be of interest in determining the question as to the rate of tariff to be imposed upon sugar or whether it shall be placed upon the free list. It gives the cost of beets per ton, the average extraction of raw sugar per ton of beets from 1907 to 1911, the average cost of 100 pounds of raw sugar in the beet, and the United States cost per hundred pounds of raw sugar in the beet in excess of cost of other countries. I am not going to take up the time of the Senate in reading the table, but I do desire to incorporate it in my remarks and make it a part of them without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and that will be done.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Factory cost of raw material.

	Cost of beets per 2,000-pound ton.	Average extraction of raw sugar per ton of beets, 1907-1911.	Average cost of 100 pounds of raw sugar in the beet.	United States cost per 100 pounds of raw sugar in the beet in excess of cost in other countries.

Mr. WORKS. Then follows another very interesting table.

Mr. THOMAS. May I ask the Senator the title of the pamphlet from which he is reading?

Mr. WORKS. I have given the title.

Mr. THOMAS. There was so much confusion in the Chamber I did not catch it.

Mr. WORKS. There is generally confusion in the Chamber. The title of it is "Cost of producing sugar in the United States, Germany, Austria-Hungary, Russia, and Cuba," compiled by Truman G. Palmer.

Then follows another table entitled "Factory cost of raw material by States." This table very clearly shows the difference in the amount paid by the State of California as compared with other States. The average cost of beets per ton laid down at the factory is stated as follows:

California, $7.29; Utah and Idaho, $5.80; Colorado, $6.79; Michigan, $6.52; Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Wisconsin, $6.43; and other States, $6.64.

The amount of raw sugar extracted per ton of beets is in California, 312.91; Utah and Idaho, 271.63; Colorado, 270.41; Michigan, 253.63; Ohio and the other States named, 251.28; and other States, 251.19.

The cost per hundred pounds of extractable raw sugar in the beet is in California $2.33; Utah and Idaho, $2.13; Colorado, $2.51; Michigan, $2.57; Ohio and the other States named, $2.55; and other States grouped, $2.64, as shown by the following table:

Factory cost of raw material, by States.

	Average cost of beets per ton, laid down at factory, 1912.	Raw sugar extracted per ton of beets, 1907-1911.[1]	Cost of 100 pounds of extractable raw sugar in the beet.
		Pounds.
California	$7.29	312.91	$2.33
Utah and Idaho	5.80	271.63	2.13
Colorado	6.79	270.41	2.51
Michigan	6.52	253.63	2.57
Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Wisconsin	6.43	251.28	2.55
Other States	6.64	251.19	2.64

[1] Based on the assumption that 100 pounds of raw sugar is equivalent to 107 pounds of refined.

There is another interesting table giving the gross return to farmers per acre. Without reading the whole of it, it shows returns in Russia per acre at $3.90 per ton, $27.79; Austria-Hungary, $3.68 per ton, $42.21; Germany, at $4.14 per ton, $55.35; and the United States, at $5.82 per ton, $58.95, as follows:

Gross returns to farmers per acre.

Russia, 7.126 tons per acre, at $3.90 per ton	$27.79
Austria-Hungary, 11.47 tons per acre, at $3.68 per ton	42.21
Germany, 13.37 tons per acre, at $4.14 per ton	55.35
United States, 10.13 tons per acre, at $5.82 per ton	58.95

There is still another table that should be taken into account. It shows the tons of beets per acre, the price paid, and the gross returns per acre. It shows that California grows 10.37 tons per acre; Utah and Idaho, 11.32; Colorado, 10.64; Michigan, 8.58; Wisconsin, 10.2; and other States, 9.7.

The price paid to the farmers per ton for beets in 1912 was: California, $6.46; Utah and Idaho, $4.97; Colorado, $5.96; Michigan, $5.69; Wisconsin, $5.60; and other States, $5.81, as shown by the following table:

	Beets per acre, 1907-1911.	Price paid to farmers per ton for beets in 1912.	Gross returns per acre.
	Tons.
California	10.37	$6.46	$66.99
Utah and Idaho	11.32	4.97	62.57
Colorado	10.64	5.96	63.41
Michigan	8.58	5.69	48.82
Wisconsin	10.02	[1] 5.60	56.11
Other States	9.07	5.81	52.69

[1] Under new classification by Department of Agriculture this is the average price paid in Wisconsin, Indiana, Ohio, and Illinois.

It will be seen, Mr. President, that in all these comparisons, whether it relates to the subject of the amount of wages paid or any other expenditure on the part of the beet growers themselves, California is paying higher prices than any other State in the Union. It shows also, in comparison as between this country and other countries, that the United States is paying more for labor and other expense than any other nation. It appears that in the State of California the best wages and the highest price for beets are paid, as compared with any other locality in the world.

Then, coming down to the question of the cost of farm labor in the beet fields of the United States, there is this statement, a part of which I shall read and all of which I shall desire to incorporate in my remarks without reading:

COST OF FARM LABOR IN THE BEET FIELDS OF THE UNITED STATES AND IN EUROPE.

The United States Department of Agriculture recently issued a bulletin on the cost of farm labor in 1912, in which it was stated—

Mr. President, it should be observed that this relates to farm wages generally—wages now, compared with the average of wages during the eighties, are about 53 per cent higher; compared with the low year of 1894 wages now are about 65 per cent higher. The current average rate of farm wages in the United States, when board is included, is—by the month, $20.81; by the day, other than harvest, $1.14; at harvest, $1.54. When board is not included the rate is—by the month, $29.58; by the day, other than harvest, $1.47; by the day, at harvest, $1.87.

That is the end of the quotation.

An analysis of the labor figures as given in the March Crop Reporter of the department shows that the average wage of day laborers on the farms in the 16 sugar-beet States in 1912 was $2.45 at harvest time and $1.95 at other seasons of the year.

So it will be seen that the average wage paid is far in excess of the amount paid in Colorado, according to the statement of the Senator from that State. Reading further from the pamphlet it says:

From 76 direct reports received from the various beet-growing sections, I found that the average daily wage in the beet fields was $2.21; the average daily earnings of pieceworkers, $3.25.

A comparison of these wages with the wages paid in the beet fields of Europe is illuminating.

The wage rate for agricultural laborers in Poland is 26.2 cents per day for men and 20.6 cents for women, while the German wage rate is the highest to be found in the three great European beet-sugar producing countries. Due to the introduction of sugar beets and the other root crops which followed and were introduced in the rotation, the acreage yield of cereal crops in Germany has been more than doubled, and instead of assisting emigration, because of inability to feed a population of 30,000,000 people, Germany to-day, with a population of 65,000,000 people, annually imports 800,000 seasonal workers to help till her fields and work in her shops.

Sixty-seven per cent of these workers come from certain provinces of Russia and Austria, the other two great sugar-producing countries, attracted by the higher wage which prevails in the German Empire.

Due to a semiofficial immigration bureau and to strict passport regulations which prevent an emigrant from living in any portion of the German Empire save the particular place for which he or she is booked, the wage is fixed and regulated to a nicety. Of late, certain districts of other countries which need workers have been bidding against Germany.

Then follows a statement showing the amount of wages paid in European countries. In Germany it is 41.4 cents per day; Denmark, 45.2 cents; Prague, 41.1 cents; Vienna, 41.1 cents; Crakow, 42.1 cents; as to women, Germany, 36 cents; Denmark, 35.4 cents; Prague, 36.1 cents; Vienna, 36.9 cents; and Crakow, 38 cents.

The statement is as follows:

The director of the German labor bureau gives the following as the standard wage when all allowances have been converted into money:

For men.

Germany, 1 mark 74 pfennigs per day (41.4 cents U. S.).
Denmark, 1 mark 90 pfennigs per day (45.2 cents U. S.).
Prague, 1 mark 73 pfennigs per day (41.1 cents U. S.).
Vienna, 1 mark 73 pfennigs per day (41.1 cents U. S.).
Crakow, 1 mark 77 pfennigs per day (42.1 cents U. S.).

For women.

Germany, 1 mark 51 pfennigs per day (36 cents U. S.).
Denmark, 1 mark 49 pfennigs per day (35.4 cents U. S.).
Prague, 1 mark 52 pfennigs per day (36.1 cents U. S.).
Vienna, 1 mark 55 pfennigs per day (36.9 cents U. S.).
Crakow, 1 mark 60 pfennigs per day (38 cents U. S.).

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. WORKS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like to inquire of the Senator from California whether it appears in the document from which he is reading that the rates he has just read as prevailing in certain countries in Europe include board or are without board?

Mr. WORKS. I am not certain whether it does or not. The quotation that I shall make, I think, will disclose that fact. The Senator will notice that in giving the amounts paid from the portion I have read the amount when board was included and when it was not included was shown.

Mr. SIMMONS. I thought the Senator gave that as to wages in California.

Mr. WORKS. No; it was as to wages generally.

Mr. SIMMONS. I did not know but that was the case as to the rates he gave in Europe.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, bearing upon this question of the employment of foreign labor, I have here a letter from a resident of Oxnard, Cal., which I should like to read. The writer says:

OXNARD, VENTURA COUNTY, CAL., April 24, 1913.

Hon. JOHN D. WORKS,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In speaking of the sugar-beet business a correspondent of the Los Angeles Tribune recently said: "If the grower, as a rule, would employ American labor in the place of cheap Asiatic labor, he would no doubt receive more sympathy from the consuming public."

Under ordinary circumstances a misleading statement like this would pass unnoticed; but as the beet business is still in its infancy and yet is destined to play such an important part in our political and business affairs, we should all try to understand it aright. The fact of the matter is that the sugar beets make so much field work that there is scarcely sufficient "American labor" to bring the crop up to that stage where the "cheap Asiatic labor" is able to take hold of it. At this stage of the crop the call for labor is generally so urgent that the farmer never thinks of asking any questions as to nationality or color. All he thinks about is getting his beets thinned and hoed or topped, and he generally pays a first-class price, and if he gets even second-class work he esteems himself more than lucky. If a person wants to see "cheap labor," they should never look in a beet field, because it's not there. These "cheap laborers," who top beets by the ton, sometimes make from $5 to $7 in a day.

The sugar beet is really one of the most wonderful plants we possess. It makes more work, puts more money into circulation, and brings more land under intensive cultivation than anything else we grow. Suddenly elliminate this one crop from our fields and the wages of farm labor would immediately fall, and upon the heels of labor would fall the price of several of our farm products. And with stagnation in the country from whence would the cities draw their prosperity?

A beet farmer produces one crop but is a very large consumer of several, among his heaviest items of expense being hay, grain, horses or mules, farm implements, and labor.

I feel that it is not only the duty of the Government to protect the cultivation of the sugar beet, but that it would be showing the greatest wisdom by fostering and encouraging this industry by every means in its power.

Respectfully, yours, JOHN EASTWOOD.

Now, Mr. President, I have found it necessary at this stage to present thus briefly the facts so far as they relate to my own State, and in comparison with the rates that are paid as compared not only with other States but with other nations as well.

I am not going to enter into a discussion of the tariff bill in any general sense. There is left, however, the question as to whether the beet growers in California are making exorbitant profits out of their business. There is really no foundation for this statement, except the testimony of Mr. Spreckels, as relating to one beet factory alone, and his statement in that respect was pure hearsay. He simply said that his father had told him so, and there has been ample evidence produced at various times showing the falsity of his statement as compared with that one factory.

I want to call the attention of the Senate to a part of the testimony that was given on this subject by Mr. Howard, whose name was mentioned in the first letter that was read, which I think will explain how this mistake, if it was a mistake, came about. He says:

It may be well at this point to explain the much-advertised and phenomenal dividend of 100 per cent declared by the Union Sugar Co. in 1911.

At the end of 1910 the issued share capital was $1,265,000, and during the previous 12 years of the company's existence there had accumulated an undivided surplus of $1,440,101.57, not in cash but represented by property and equipment.

Of this amount, $607,678.65 was due partly to assessments paid upon the stock and partly to profit on the sales of land which had been leased with the privilege of purchase.

Senator SMOOT. Pardon me. You say that seven hundred and some odd thousand dollars came from assessments?

Mr. HOWARD. $607,000 was partly due to assessments and partly due to profits on the sales of land.

Senator SMOOT. What assessments were they?

Mr. BALLOU. Two and a half dollars a share, three times; seven and a half dollars a share were paid on those assessments.

Senator SMOOT. The assessments were made for what purpose? To increase the capital stock or to provide for losses you had made?

Mr. HOWARD. It was not for the purpose of issuing stock. The assessments were made to pay for losses and new equipment.

Senator SMOOT. That is what I wanted to find out.

Mr. HOWARD. The soil was found to be too light and sandy for sugar beets, but admirably adapted for beans, which crop for several successive years had commanded such high prices as to create a strong demand for suitable land. Availing ourselves of existing conditions the company exercised its option, subdivided and resold the land, reinvested the proceeds in other localities, and credited the profits.

The balance of the surplus, $832,422.42, was contributed during the 12-year period by the sugar business.

To compensate the share owners for assessments, land and sugar profits, which had gone into property investments, a stock dividend equal to the outstanding share capital as of December 31, 1910, was declared and paid.

But cash dividends had previously been paid totaling $895,780, or an average of nearly $75,000 per year, equal to nearly 6 per cent per annum on the outstanding capital on December 31, 1910.

If, then, we take the $832,422.42 contributed by the sugar business to the undivided profits, and which was capitalized by this stock dividend, it will be found to average, during its 12 years of accumulation, $69,368.53 per year, which is equal to 5.5 per cent on the share capital on December 31, 1910.

So that instead of the carefully misrepresented dividend of 100 per cent, we find an average dividend of the Union Sugar Co. resulting from its sugar business during the first 12 years of its existence of 6 per cent per annum in cash and 5½ per cent in stock.

But, Mr. President, it is fair to say that the stock of the company was practically worthless, as is suggested in the testimony of Mr. Howard. It was found that the land in that section was not suitable to beet growing. They realized some of their so-called profits by selling the land to be devoted to other purposes, and this beet-sugar factory, that is alleged to have made profits to the extent of 100 per cent, has gone out of business because it could make no profits at all, and the plant itself has been dismantled.

Now, sir, I think I have said all I desire to say at this time.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, for information, I should like to ask the Senator from California one question. What is the market value of the beet lands of California?

Mr. WORKS. I am not able to state that accurately, but I will do so before this matter is disposed of. I should say, however, such lands are worth in the neighborhood of $200 an acre.

Mr. SIMMONS. What was the market value of those lands before they began to be cultivated in beets?

Mr. WORKS. That depended very much on the kind and quality of the land. There are some lands there that are practically worthless; they are what we call out in our State alkali lands. Such land is impregnated with alkali until it would not grow any other crop, so far as has been discovered, except the sugar beet. The result of growing beets upon the land has been to reclaim it from that condition, and to make it valuable land not only for the purpose of growing beets but for the growing of other crops as well.

Mr. SIMMONS. So that the beet grower not only gets a profit upon the sale of his beets, but he gets a large profit in the enhanced valuation of his land by reason of the fertilizing effects of beet growing?

Mr. WORKS. So far as it applies to that kind of land, yes; but not always. The beet land, I may say to the Senator from North Carolina, does not differ, so far as prices are concerned, from other farm lands in California.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator means the price of the beet lands does not differ?

Mr. WORKS. Not materially.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like to ask the Senator from California if the beet lands have not increased in value since the beginning of beet culture in that State more rapidly than have the lands cultivated in other crops?

Mr. WORKS. Cultivated in other crops? Yes; but——

Mr. SIMMONS. I mean crops outside; I will say citrous-fruit crops.

Mr. WORKS. I think that would be so with respect to lands that are used for the purpose of growing grain and like crops, but the land is of greater value for beet growing than for those purposes.

I will say to the Senator from North Carolina that I am probably not prepared to give him accurate information on this subject at this time. I would not want to mislead him; but I shall be able to give the necessary information at the proper time.

Mr. SIMMONS. Could the Senator now give me some information as to the labor cost of cultivating an acre of land in beets?

Mr. WORKS. No; I am not able to do so other than is done in these tables which are given. I am not a beet grower or a beet manufacturer. I am just like the Senator; I have to get my information from other persons, as best I can, and I have endeavored conscientiously to do that from all sources where I thought I could get accurate and reliable information. Further along I expect to lay that information before the Senate.

I have risen now simply for the purpose of meeting some of the statements that were made which I felt reflected upon my State with respect to the payment of wages and the price paid for the beets.

Mr. SIMMONS. I want to say to the Senator that I am asking these questions because I know he would not answer me unless he had information that was entirely satisfactory to himself.

Mr. WORKS. I would not, I hope.

Mr. SIMMONS. And I hoped that the Senator might have that information.

Mr. WORKS. As I have already stated to the Senator, I have not the information at this time.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I wish to introduce a bill——

Mr. SIMMONS. I hope the Senator will not attempt to do so at this time. I am afraid, if the Senator does that, other Senators will desire to do the same thing, and we may be interrupted in the discussion of the pending question.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Very well; I will withhold it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is still on the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] to the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the motion of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS].

Mr. GALLINGER. As I understand the matter, Mr. President, the Senator from Pennsylvania desires to incorporate in his amendment the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, so that the question will be put as on one amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. As one amendment. The Chair so understands. There being no objection, that will be done.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I shall not at this time enter into any general discussion of what is popularly known as the sugar question. The debate upon the motion to refer this bill to the Finance Committee has, however, brought into the question some phases which may as well, so far as I am concerned, be discussed now as at any other time. One of them involves the rate of wages which prevails in the sugar-beet industry. That discussion was precipitated by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] in his general insistence upon the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. During that discussion something was said, among others by myself, about the wage rate in the beet fields of the West, which has given rise to a somewhat interesting series of events culminating in the receipt of a good deal of information upon the subject from various sources throughout the West.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. THOMAS. I do.

Mr. SIMMONS. I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. My colleague [Mr. WARREN] is engaged outside the Chamber on important Government business. He is paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER].

Mr. BRYAN. I desire to say that my colleague [Mr. FLETCHER] is necessarily absent. He is paired, as has been stated, with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN].

Mr. RANSDELL. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. THORNTON] is too unwell to be present in the Senate to-day.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to state that my colleague, the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] is necessarily absent. He is paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT].

Mr. HOLLIS. I desire to state that the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] is detained on important public business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present. The Senator from Colorado will proceed.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I had stated at the time of the roll call that a great deal of information had been obtained upon this phase of the question under discussion since the debate upon it began on the 9th day of May. My purpose is not to detain the Senate by a recital of all of the matter which has reached my own hands, some of which came voluntarily and some of which was solicited, but, rather, to discuss some other phases of the labor question as connected with this industry, which, to my mind, are as important as the mere matter of wages, if not more so.

I took occasion last Monday, I think, to correct a statement which I had previously made and which I had hazarded as to the wage rates in the beet fields of my own State. I intended, in that connection, to call attention to an equally conspicuous error of my distinguished friend from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], who, in the course of his remarks upon the 9th instant, said:

> You have got to pay the laborer who works in the beet fields, on an average, $2.75 a day, while the peon who works in the sugar fields of Cuba, who wears a clout upon his stomach and not even a hat upon his head or shoes upon his feet, does not get over 10 cents a day; and you propose to pit the farmers and the laborers upon the farms in that industry against such labor as that.

Here is a statement of a wage rate which is lower than anything that ever occurred to me as being possible, either in Cuba or outside of it. Yet my regard for the learning and generally accurate statements of my distinguished friend from Michigan was such that I did not feel warranted in challenging the assertion at the time it was made.

Since then I have made some investigation of the subject—a very slight one, because the information I desired came from another source. In the House of Representatives, on the 28th of April, Representative HARDWICK, in discussing this phase of the tariff question, compared the wage rate in this industry as between the State of Louisiana and the Republic of Cuba, and at page 731 of the RECORD he gave it in these words:

> The labor cost in factories in Cuba and Louisiana is practically the same, and for field labor Louisiana pays hardly as much as is paid in Cuba. It appeared in the sworn testimony before the special committee that in Louisiana the sugar planters pay the following rates for field labor: Seventy-five to eighty cents to men per day, 75 cents per day to women, and $1 per day in harvesting time; whereas in Cuba for the same class of labor the planters are paying from $1 to $1.25 per day, and in Cuba the women do not work in the fields. So it seems to me that the equalization of labor cost is not involved in this proposition.

Thus, the record discloses estimates of wage rates which are mutually erroneous and that the head and front of my offending seems to be both equalized and offset in this discussion by the remarkable assertion of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I did not hear the Senator's statement as to what the Senator from Michigan said was the prevailing wage in the cane fields of Cuba.

Mr. THOMAS. Ten cents a day.

I shall not take serious issue with any of the Senators from the beet-sugar States upon or as to the question of per diem rates of wages in the beet fields beyond calling attention to some facts in my own possession and to the nature of that labor as I understand it.

It is what is called contract labor, or hand labor, and is a prime essential to the successful cultivation of the beet. The prevailing rate is $20 an acre. It is done by field hands, generally speaking, operating as a sort of colony or in company with each other and under the direction of a head man. It is evident, therefore, that the wage rate depends very largely upon the capacity of the contractor and his employees and the amount of labor performed by them within a given time. Inasmuch as this labor is frequently performed by women and children as well as by men, it is difficult to say what the wage rate is, unless it be calculated upon some basis which takes these things into consideration.

Another phase of the matter is that the work is not confined to any specific number of hours, and is labor of the most exacting and back-breaking sort. There is nothing disgraceful about it; there is nothing dishonest or dishonorable about it; but it is hard work of the lowest quality, done in the broiling sun, and which must be done, as I am informed, as the progressive growth of the crop requires it. Those engaged in it toil from daybreak until darkness, and sometimes beyond, thus embodying not 8 hours, but 10, 14, and 16 hours out of 24. It is this sort of day labor of which men speak when they assert that it commands $2 and $2.50 per day. Measured by the 8-hour standard instead of 12 or 14, the figures would, of course, be considerably less.

Upon this subject the labor commissioner of my State reports—and I am perfectly willing to take his statement—that "the contracts are $20 an acre for thinning, two hands pulling and topping beets, all contract work, foreigners only employed. All the family work 16 hours a day, about $1.50 each, and board themselves."

In view of the fact that I inquired of the junior Senator from California [Mr. WORKS], on the 9th instant, as to the class of employees in this work in his section of the country, I deemed it only proper to ascertain from the labor commissioner of that State what the facts were. My inquiries were as to the nationality of the labor employed in that State, as well as to its compensation, and this is the reply which I have received from him:

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., May 10.

C. S. THOMAS,
Highlands, Washington, D. C.:

Help employed on beet farms in California, 1910, Japanese represented 66 per cent; Chinese, Mexicans, Hindus, 12 per cent. Large acreage controlled by Japanese, who only employ Japanese help. Work done for others under contract. Wages for weeders, $1.50; toppers and loaders, $1.93 per day, without board.

And although he does not say so, I assume that the hours of labor are equally exacting as elsewhere.

I stated the other day that this labor was largely, if not entirely, foreign in its character. The Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] seems to infer that this statement carried with it something of a reflection upon those who were engaged in this line of employment. It was far from my intention to cast the slightest reflection upon these people. The fundamental assertion—I will not call it argument—of the protectionists of the hour is that their system of duties, by means of and through which the masses of this country are taxed for the benefit of the few, elevates and dignifies American labor by giving to the American wage earner the opportunity to receive proper compensation for his labor, and thus enables him to support his family in comfort and to educate his children, thus making theirs a life of opportunity of which they need only take advantage to elevate themselves to the pinnacle of American citizenship. But if the citizen is, as I contend, supplanted in many lines of protected industry, and ultimately will be in all of them, by the substitution of a cheaper imported labor, this assertion can not be true.

I therefore referred to the nationality of this particular class of labor in order to focus attention upon a fact that I think is applicable to every highly protected industry in this country, which is that it has driven and is driving out of employment our own citizens and substituting in their places the hordes of foreigners against whom there is no duty and from the resources of which these great interests may at all times draw their supplies. My contention was that the beet-sugar industry was no exception to this general rule; that the class of labor which was to be protected by a continuation of existing conditions was that class of labor, to a large extent, which has recently necessitated so much diplomatic intercourse, if I may so term it, between the central powers at Washington and the governor and the Legislature of the State of California, with whose action I have abundant sympathy, and with whose policy I can find no fault, because California is face to face with a condition which is largely based upon the operation of our protective system, its greed and overcapitalization prompting it to exploit the laborer and the material man at one end of the line, while exalting prices to the consumer at the other.

This was the chief reason and motive which I had in focusing attention upon that particular phase of the situation. My attention was called to it a year or two ago, if I remember correctly, by reading an article entitled "Beet sugar and the tariff," by Prof. Taussig, of the chair of economics in Harvard University, in which he says:

No machinery has been devised that serves to dispense with the large amount of hand labor called for. "Several attempts have been made to construct a mechanical device by which the beets can be topped, thus saving a large expense, and perhaps a successful device of this kind may some day be invented." So far as is known at the present time, however, this process has not been successfully accomplished by machinery, and the topping must still be done by hand. "Inventive ingenuity in Europe and especially in America," said the special agent of the Department of Agriculture in 1906, "has been directed to planning a harvester which will do away, as far as possible, with this expensive hand work. * * * It can not be said that any of these newly devised implements works successfully in all soils." In 1909 he reported that "these machines are not now in general use, but their use is increasing," and he still laid stress on the need of elaborate hand cultivation.

It follows that the successful growing of the sugar beet calls for a large amount of monotonous unskilled labor; no small part of it labor that can be done by women and children, and that tempts to their utilization. In the documents of the Department of Agriculture there is constant reference to the peculiar labor problem confronting the farmer who sets out to raise sugar beets. "As a rule the farmer, if he grows beets to any extent, does not have on his farm sufficient labor to take care of the work of thinning, bunching, hoeing, and harvesting the sugar beets." Not only does the typical American farm and farm community lack the number of laborers required; the labor itself is of a kind distasteful to our farmers. "Thinning and weeding by hand while on one's knees is not a work or posture agreeable to the average American farmer. Bending over the rows and crawling along them on one's hands and knees all day long are things that the contracting farmer is sure to object to as drudgery. * * * Our farmers ride on their stirring plows, cultivators, and many implements." As was remarked by one of the witnesses before the Ways and Means Committee at a tariff hearing, "The thinning and the topping of the beets, it is pretty hard to get our American fellows to do, and they prefer to hire the labor and pay for it." The Kansas State Board of Agriculture informs its constituents "If the American farmer is to realize all possibilities in raising sugar beets, he will do so through his ability as a superintendent and not as a drudge."

The manner in which this need of extra labor has been met is instructive not only as regards the beet-sugar situation itself but also as regards the general trend of industry in the United States during the last generation.

That is the subject to which I have just referred, the general trend of industry toward the employment of a class of labor that is un-American.

Almost everywhere in the beet-sugar districts we find laborers who are employed or contracted for in gangs; an inferior class, utilized and perhaps exploited by a superior class.

PAINT CREEK COAL FIELDS, WEST VIRGINIA.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it becomes the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Senate resolution 37, authorizing the investigation of conditions in the Paint Creek coal fields, West Virginia.

Mr. KERN. In the remarks I made yesterday, which have not yet been printed, I inadvertently omitted a quotation from a speech of Gen. Garfield in the Milligan case before the Supreme Court March 6, 1866. It is a short quotation. I ask unanimous consent for leave to insert it in its appropriate place in my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there is no objection, that may be done.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. KERN. I was asking unanimous consent to insert a quotation in the speech I delivered yesterday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There being no objection, that may be done.

Mr. SMOOT. Would the Senator object to having it read, so that it may be answered if anybody desires to answer it?

Mr. KERN. Yes; I will read it.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to the insertion, only I thought it would be better, perhaps, to read it.

Mr. KERN. The quotation is as follows:

Your decision will mark an era in American history. The just and final settlement of this great question will take a high place among the great achievements which have immortalized this decade. It will establish forever this truth of inestimable value to us and to mankind: That a republic can wield the vast enginery of war without breaking down the safeguards of liberty; can suppress insurrection and put down rebellion, however formidable, without destroying the bulwarks of law; can by the might of its armed millions preserve and defend both nationality and liberty. Victories on the field were of priceless value, for they plucked the life of the Republic out of the hands of its enemies; but

"Peace hath her victories
No less renowned than war."

And if the protection of law shall by your decision be extended over every acre of our peaceful territory, you will have rendered the great decision of the century.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a concurrent resolution, adopted by the General Court of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a joint memorial of the Territorial Legislature of Alaska, which was referred to the Committee on Territories and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY FOR THE DISTRICT OF ALASKA, JUNEAU, ALASKA.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, Territory of Alaska, ss:

I, William L. Distin, secretary of the Territory of Alaska, do hereby certify that the annexed copy is a full, true, and complete transcript of senate joint memorial No. 9 of the Alaska Territorial Legislature.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of Alaska at Juneau, this 17th day of April, A. D. 1913.

[SEAL.] WM. L. DISTIN,
Secretary of Alaska.

Senate joint memorial 9.

To the President of the United States of America, greeting:

We, your memorialists, the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, the youngest and smallest Territorial legislative body within the confines of the United States, representing a larger and richer area of land than any similar body of men heretofore under the American flag, do most earnestly request you to consider the within statements and take action thereon.

About 16 years ago the first great rush was on to the interior of Alaska. Previous to that time southeastern Alaska had been settled to some extent and fishing and mining had been carried on as a business, notably in the vicinity of Juneau, the capital of the Territory. The mammoth Treadwell gold mine had been partially equipped and some other smaller mines put in operation. All of the settlements and development of consequence were at that time along the coast line and easy of access. About the date mentioned above gold in placer deposits and quartz veins, coal in vast quantities, and oil were discovered in the interior of Alaska. People from every State in the Union located and purchased mining claims under the laws of the United States and proceeded to operate some of them under the same legal rights as citizens of the United States had done throughout all the mineral-bearing States of the West, but under much harder conditions.

Of the resources of Alaska there can be no question. First, the placer belts are large and scattered from Cook Inlet to Fairbanks, Iditarod, Kuyokuk, Candle, Nome, and other camps; and aside from the richer grounds, there are thousands upon thousands of acres of low-grade placer ground that can not be worked at a profit under present high cost of transportation of supplies and fuel. Second, the quartz gold condition is receiving much attention, and along the seacoast it is now developing into a large and profitable business. The quartz gold, however, is not confined to the coast. Slowly quartz mines are being developed in the interior, and under more favorable transportation and fuel conditions would forge ahead by leaps and bounds. Third, both on the coast in certain places and in the interior there are numerous copper mines. Those near the coast can be and are worked at a profit. Nevertheless they are handicapped in many places on account of the high cost of fuel necessary for the generating of power for mining and smelting. Taking up the copper mining of the interior, we find a far different proposition. The fuel question is prohibitive, excepting to operate the richest of properties, and as a consequence only one copper mine in the interior of Alaska is now in operation and shipping ore, and that one could not operate if it were not exceedingly high-grade ore. There are hundreds of copper properties, some quite rich and many of lower grade, that would be opened up and shipments made therefrom were shipping conditions different. To sum up, the opening of the quartz gold, low-grade placer and copper deposits of the interior of Alaska depends solely on cheap fuel and adequate and cheaper transportation controlled by the Government.

COST OF FUEL.

With millions of tons of good steam, stove, and coking coal lying within a few miles of salt water, the opening of which has been retarded by what we consider a mistaken policy, the citizen of Alaska pays for his own house coal brought from British Columbia mines, in trust owned and controlled bottoms, from $14 to $30 per short ton in the most favorable localities, north and west of Juneau and Sitka, and $4 would be a fair price for Alaska coal delivered at the same localities.

THE COAL QUESTION.

It has become generally known throughout the United States that there are extensive coal deposits near the coast, as well as in the interior of Alaska, and because some misguided citizen, not of Alaska, sought to obtain control of large areas of coal land, perhaps in some cases not within the law, the great majority, yes, 99 per cent, of the entire population of Alaska who have no interests, directly or indirectly, in the coal question, only so far as to obtain cheaper fuel, have been denied the use and benefit of Alaska coal pending the settlement of the alleged rights of these so-called coal claimants.

This body declares:

First. That all coal claimants who located coal lands strictly within the law as it existed at that time should receive patents therefor. We do not deal with or consider any illegal entry. We do, however, believe that the coal claimants should have their day in court.

Second. Regardless of the rights of any or all claimants, we do most respectfully urge that the Government of the United States take immediate action and in some way open the coal lands of Alaska, or some of them, and that the selling price of the coal will be controlled by a department of the General Government of the United States, to the end that justice may be brought about to all of the people of Alaska.

TRANSPORTATION FOR ALASKA.

Many portions of Alaska Territory lie adjacent to the coast line and therefore have a measure of competitive and fairly reasonable freight rates, most notable is southeastern Alaska. As to the localities farther north this does not exist. For instance, the lowest freight rate to Katalla, Cordova, Valdez, and Seward, excepting on coal, is $11 per ton, weight or measurement. Quite often this runs up to even $30 per ton or higher. On all explosives the rate is $25 per ton, and as one goes farther west along the Kenai Peninsula and north the rates are much higher. First-class passenger rates to the first-mentioned points are $45, the distance being about 1,600 miles. The great crying need, however, is cheaper transportation from the seacoast to the interior, and it was for the purpose of examining routes and conditions pertaining to interior transportation that the railroad commission was appointed and did visit Alaska during the fall of 1912, and after making a hurried examination reported to the President of the United States their findings and recommendations, and it was their general report that this legislative body indorsed at the beginning of this present session. Southeastern Alaska is not much interested in interior transportation only so far as it covers the White Pass & Yukon Railroad, over which rates are exceedingly high.

The coal fields under consideration lie largely within the third judicial district, as well as the developed copper properties and a portion of the gold quartz properties, and the people residing in the second, third and fourth divisions of Alaska are mostly interested in the question of interior transportation. But to the third and fourth divisions the transportation question is vital, viz, to transport coal to the seacoast to be distributed by water where needed and to furnish coal and other supplies, machinery, and men to interior points at reasonable rates.

We are aware you have full knowledge as to the transportation system now in Alaska, and it is only necessary to give a few figures as to the present freight rates per ton for goods laid down at the end of the Copper River & Northwestern Railroad. Dynamite laid down at that point costs $90 per ton freight, including water and rail from Seattle. The rate on groceries and provisions, less than car lots, is $60 per ton, and all other goods, hay, feed, and machinery in the same proportion. The rate out on ore is graduated on lines that an operator can not afford to mine and ship grades of copper ore lower than 20 per cent, and there are very few mines that can produce ore of this grade even by close sorting The Bonanza mine that is now shipping and paying is an exception, and the fact that that mine is operating and paying is not a criterion by any means, for it is the only copper property in the Chitina copper belt that can afford to ship as a business under the present conditions.

As to other interior points: During the best days of the Fairbanks camp, when $10,000,000 in value was taken from the ground by the miners yearly, it is stated upon good authority that one-half of the whole amount was paid out for freight and transportation. This statement is verified by report of Alfred Brooks, of the United States Geological Survey. At the present time the Fairbanks camp, as well as others, is working on much lower grade gold-bearing gravels, of which there are large areas; therefore cheaper transportation is absolutely necessary in order to work the present low-grade placers at a profit. Aside from the present established camps there are thousands of acres of low-grade placers that have not been touched owing to the high cost of transportation.

WHAT IS THE REMEDY?

The people of Alaska are hoping for and expecting that the present administration will at its earliest convenience adopt some measure that will open the coal fields of Alaska, or some of them, on lines that monopoly can not control the selling price of the product thereof, and at the same time do justice to all honestly located claims and claimants.

They also pray most earnestly that matters will be put in force in some way, and soon, that will start construction work on two or more lines of railway that will start at tidewater and extend to the interior, through the beautiful valleys of agricultural land, and on, until every camp of importance and every valley fit for agriculture purposes shall have been reached and the inhabitants thereof supplied with cheap and reasonable transportation controlled by the strong arm of the Government.

Notwithstanding discouragements and the unnatural obstacles thrown in the way of the development of Alaska, the business of the country shows improvements along commercial lines. The total trade for the year 1912 aggregated $72,741,000, exceeding that of any former year by 27 per cent. The white population is about 30,000; thus the commerce of the country shows about $2,400 for each man, woman, and child in the Territory. It is worthy of comment that about $25,000,000 of the exports from Alaska during the year 1912 were gold, silver, and copper, which have been added to the permanent wealth of the United States.

With a population of but 30,000, the commerce of Alaska with the United States far exceeds that of the Philippine Islands, with a population of over 8,000,000 people. With this in mind compare the expenditures of the Government in Alaska and in the Philippines, and remember that the population of Alaska is composed of loyal sons and daughters of the Union.

From the earliest settlement of our country the Government has encouraged the forward movement and the opening of new territory, and it has always had within its borders the blood and brawn of the pioneers; and as they, single handed and alone and in small groups, have blazed the way and advanced into the unknown, their faces ever to the westward, combating not only wild nature, but often wilder men, the strong arm of the Government has followed the pioneer and made it possible to still follow with more civilized modes of life, even going to the extent of donating hundreds of millions of value in lands in aid of transportation. The Government has given millions of money for the aid of the brown man of the Philippine Islands and has given to Cuba millions in money and lives of brave men. We would respectfully ask, Are the Cubans, the Filipinos, or the Porto Ricans more valuable to this great country of ours than the hardy, brave, intelligent pioneers of Alaska, every one of whom, from 16 to 70 years of age, is willing to fight for his country and flag? Are we, the citizens of this great Alaska empire, not entitled to due consideration and help from our country? Men are here from every State and representing every phase and condition of life, from the old grizzled advance agent of civilization, who has faced storm and flood alone, sought out the secrets of nature, and then returned to civilization to spread the glad news that the energetic and progressive business man and capitalist might follow over the paths he has made smooth and develop and reap with him the wealth he has found. We believe that the time has come for the just consideration of our great needs by those in authority and power to relieve and assist in the development of our great Territory.

The secretary of the Territory of Alaska is hereby requested to forward a certified copy of this memorial to each of the following persons: One to the President of the United States, one to the Secretary of the Interior, and one each to the honorable the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, and one to the Delegate to Congress from Alaska.

Adopted by the senate April 3, 1913.

President of the Senate.

AMENDMENT TO INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STONE submitted an amendment providing for the appointment of a joint commission to investigate Indian affairs, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

THE TARIFF.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I am exceedingly anxious to go on with the consideration of the motion to refer the tariff bill to the Committee on Finance. For very nearly a week now this matter has been held up, and there are a great number of experts who have been sent here by the department from New York to assist the subcommittees and the committee. They are here in idleness because Senators can not find time to take up these questions. On that account and because I am sure the country is anxious that this matter shall be finally settled, I dislike very much to yield to any other business at this time.

I wish to inquire of the Senator from Indiana if at a certain hour—at a certain time—he will not consent to lay aside temporarily the consideration of the unfinished business.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I sympathize very greatly with the members of the Finance Committee in their effort to bring the question which has been before the Senate to a vote. I am aware that there are a number of people who are vitally interested in the question they have immediately in hand. There are many millions of people interested in the question that is now before the Senate.

I shall be very glad to make an agreement that if a vote is not reached on the resolution now before the Senate within one hour from this time I will consent, if it is agreeable to the Senate, that it may be temporarily laid aside until the other matter is disposed of. I do not desire to lay it aside except temporarily, so that it will not lose its place on the calendar,

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection at all to taking up the matter of referring the tariff bill, but I would not want it understood that if a Senator was speaking one hour from now, and his speech was not concluded, he would be taken off the floor. Of course, the Senator recognizes the fact that the unfinished business would have to be laid aside by unanimous consent, and I would not want it understood that at the end of an hour a Senator should be taken off the floor.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It does not require a vote of the Senate temporarily to lay aside the unfinished business.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Indiana said he would ask unanimous consent that it be temporarily laid aside. If any other business is not taken up by unanimous consent, it then becomes the unfinished business. Of course, the Senator from Indiana does not want to have the unfinished business lose its place.

Mr. KERN. I will not be discourteous, of course, to any Senator on the floor. I thought in about an hour, if the debate continues until that time, it could be laid aside; but unless it was apparent that some Senator was speaking against time——

Mr. SMOOT. With that understanding, I have not any objection at all.

Mr. KERN. We will endeavor to preserve the courtesies.

Mr. THOMAS. At the conclusion of the hour, I ask the permission of the Senate and the Chair that I may then be permitted to finish what I have to say on the matter which has been under discussion.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is this a request for unanimous consent?

Mr. STONE. No.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The unfinished business is before the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina a question. The Senator from North Carolina urges as a necessity for the immediate disposition of his motion to refer the tariff bill so called to the Finance Committee the fact that there are a very large number of experts here who have been called for the purpose of aiding the committee.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will say to the Senator I stated that only as a subsidiary reason; that is all.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is a very important suggestion.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; it is.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think it should have some weight. Would it be asking too much of the Senator from North Carolina to tell us just how many experts there are waiting?

Mr. SIMMONS. I could not state the number; I think six or seven, probably more than that.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Six or seven?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; for the different subcommittees.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina again, would it be inconvenient for him to furnish to the Senate the names of those experts?

Mr. SIMMONS. Not at all. I will state that they are generally appraisers sent over from New York by the department to assist the committee.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I wonder if they are that type of men described by the President of the United States in one of his very interesting works.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know what type of men they are. I will state to the Senator that we have asked the department to send us from New York experts who are familiar with certain schedules, and they have sent them to us. If the minority members of the committee desire their services after we are through with them, they can have them.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does the Senator mean that these experts are regularly employed experts in the Treasury Department?

Mr. SIMMONS. I mean they are regularly employed by the Government.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. In what capacity?

Mr. SIMMONS. They are, I think, connected with the appraisers' office in the city of New York.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is it entirely for their convenience that we must move along as rapidly as the Senator suggests?

Mr. SIMMONS. Not for their convenience at all, but there is a responsibility attached to them and we are keeping them from their duties.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Are they entitled to extra pay?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; but they are entitled and will receive and have received from the committee from time immemorial, ever since I have been on the committee, their actual expenses in the city of Washington—their board and traveling expenses. I will ask the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] if that is not true?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Are these the same gentlemen who have been aiding the House Committee on Ways and Means in the preparation of the bill?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know whether any of these experts have been before the House committee or not.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is it proposed that the testimony of these experts shall be taken by the Committee on Finance?

Mr. SIMMONS. We are not taking their testimony. We are asking from them information with reference to certain schedules.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will they impart this information privately or publicly?

Mr. SIMMONS. I assume they will talk with us just as the experts assigned to the minority members of the committee by the department confer with them. I know that there are experts assigned by the department to the minority members of the committee, because I have had to approve the account of experts who have been assigned to minority members of the committee at this session of the Senate upon these tariff schedules. I think the Senator is not familiar with the course that has been pursued by every Finance Committee as to the revision of the tariff. It was and has been the custom all along. When we were considering the Payne-Aldrich bill, the minority and the majority members of the committee had experts assigned by the department to assist them.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order. This is an absurd waste of time. I ask for the regular order.

Mr. SIMMONS. I agree entirely with the Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order is demanded. The regular order, which is the unfinished business, is before the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I suppose that the question of the reference of the tariff bill has now been superseded, and under the rule the business before the Senate is the resolution of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN].

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the business before the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The understanding has been, I assume, that that would be discussed for an hour, after which the Senate would return to the consideration of the Finance Committee's motion. If the Senator from North Carolina insists that the best reason he can give for the immediate reference of that bill to his committee——

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, Mr. President, I stated to the Senator that I had given that merely as a subsidiary reason.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The unfinished business is before the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am discussing that question, Mr. President, and it will remain the unfinished business unless we can have discussion in the usual and orderly way. If the best reason that can be given for the immediate reference of the tariff bill is that urged by the Senator from North Carolina, of course I could not yield, because Senators have not been in the habit of moving to suit the convenience merely of the attachés of the Treasury Department in the administration of the customs laws. This matter is of too much moment——

Mr. SIMMONS. Did the Senator hear me when I said that the reason of the holding off of this matter is the Finance Committee were unable to go on with the work of preparing the bill?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is just the point I am approaching.

Mr. SIMMONS. Did the Senator understand me to state that the main reason why I desire action is that the Senators charged with this duty might go on with the bill in the interest of dispatch and the public welfare?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am afraid I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. I stated as a subsidiary reason that we had these gentlemen here on expense and we could not use them, because our time is taken up here in the Senate Chamber with the discussion of the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I am afraid that I misunderstood the Senator from North Carolina. I understood him to say that he would like to resume the consideration of the motion, because there were a large number of experts here who desired to be heard. Now, if I am in error——

Mr. SIMMONS. I stated that as one of the reasons.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If I am in error about that, and it is a matter of convenience to my colleagues, who can not leave the Chamber because of the discussion of this measure to attend to this bill, that presents a vastly different question.

I wish to say once for all and to relieve the mind of the Senator from North Carolina, if he is at all apprehensive regarding my course, that if he thinks it is my purpose to wage prolonged and fruitless contest against an appropriate reference of this bill, he is mistaken. I have no such purpose in my mind. I did object to the unanimous-consent agreement this morning, because I was unwilling to be a party even to the reference of this bill to the committee, especially when it goes to the committee with the avowed intention of acting so promptly upon it and of accepting no suggestions from the millions of our countrymen who are vitally affected by its provisions.

I am perfectly willing that the Senator from North Carolina should press his motion. He need not hesitate a moment, so far as I am concerned, to give me an opportunity to vote "nay." That was the purpose of my objection this morning; nothing more. We will have ample opportunity to discuss it before it ripens into law.

But I was amazed and perhaps in error when I assumed that the sole reason for its immediate reference was the convenience of regular employees of the Treasury Department. I have an abundance of information which I believe would be important, which has been communicated to me by business people in my own State and manufacturers and merchants in other States. I could appropriately delay consideration for a number of days, but that has never been my policy here, and I do not propose to do so now.

Having said what I have to say about it, I am quite prepared, Mr. President, that the Senate shall proceed with the resolution of the Senator from Indiana or that the motion of the Senator from North Carolina may go to a vote.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator now agree to a time this afternoon to vote?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; I shall agree to nothing in connection with this bill; and if the Senator from North Carolina and his party in power desire to refer this bill on the motion now pending, I shall simply content myself with voting "nay."

Mr. STONE. The motion is pending.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. But it is not insisted upon. It has been waived to accommodate the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator has taken up 20 minutes of that hour.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I could take up 20 minutes more in reply to the statement of the Senator from North Carolina. His speech appeared in the RECORD only this morning and I have had no opportunity to examine it. But I shall not even take the time to do that. We would make progress fully as rapidly with just a little inclination to humor the disposition of Senators who are unalterably opposed to this bill, and I shall by no unanimous consent or vote, from the first roll call to the last, give my approval to a single line or syllable of your bill.

I dislike, however, to think that from day to day a great department of the Government is called upon to threaten the business people of America with prosecution if perchance they undertake to save the industry now in jeopardy.

Mr. President, I have said all I am going to say at the present time. Later I may read a few chapters by the present President that were written before he assumed his high public place, but I forbear now to offend the sensitiveness of my genial friend from Missouri [Mr. STONE].

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2441) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 3.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1 and agree to the same.

The committee of conference have been unable to agree on amendment numbered 2.

THOMAS S. MARTIN,
LEE S. OVERMAN,
F. E. WARREN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
SWAGAR SHERLEY,
FREDK. H. GILLETT,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I move that the conference report be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia moves that the conference report, so far as it reports an agreement, be adopted. Unless there is objection, such will be the order.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I should like to know what the amendments are, and especially what is the amendment from which the Senate has receded.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The two items on which the committee reached an agreement were purely formal ones, consisting of the addition of the letter "s" in two places. There is only one item that is really in controversy, and that is this: The House sent the bill to us containing a provision that when vacancies occur in the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers they shall not be filled until the whole number of members is reduced to 5. There are now 11 members of the board. The Senate amended the House bill by striking out the provision which contemplated a reduction of the membership of the Board of Managers of the Soldiers' Home from 11 to 5 by not making appointments when vacancies occur.

Mr. TOWNSEND. And it is upon that amendment that the Senate and the House are still in disagreement?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Yes; the House seems very persistent in rejecting the Senate amendment. The House wants the number of the Board of Managers of the Soldiers' Home reduced to five. The Senate amended the bill by striking out the provision and thus declining to make the reduction.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am very much in favor of the Senate insisting upon its position in the matter. I do not think we ought to yield.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I concur in the statement of the Senator from Michigan. I also most strongly concur in the action of the conference committee in adhering to the action of the Senate. As I understand it, the striking out of the provision in the House amendment leaves the law as it is at present.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The Senate amended the House bill by striking out the provision reducing the number.

Mr. BURTON. That leaves the law as it now is?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. That leaves the law as it now is, if we strike out that provision in the House bill.

I move that the Senate further insist upon its amendment and ask a further conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. MARTIN of Virginia, Mr. OVERMAN, and Mr. WARREN conferees on the part of the Senate at the further conference.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Pursuant to the notice which I gave on yesterday of an amendment of the rules, and which went over for one day, I submit a resolution and ask that it be read and referred to the Committee on Rules.

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 84) was read and referred to the Committee on Rules, as follows:

Resolved, That the rules of the Senate be amended as follows: Rule XII, clause 1, after the words "by the Senate," there shall be inserted the following: "and any Senator may arise and declare that he is paired and how he would vote if not paired, and may add that being present he desires to be so recorded in order to constitute a quorum; whereupon he shall be so recorded, and his presence as a part of the quorum announced by the Chair."

PAINT CREEK COAL FIELDS, WEST VIRGINIA.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the resolution (S. Res. 37) of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor? The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. GOFF. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate very long in the further consideration of this matter. I commence to-day by asking the Senate to advise me what possible good can result from the adoption of this resolution. I can very readily see how it might result in disaster, but not how it can bring any good to the State of West Virginia, to the country at large, or give any additional information or advice to the Senate.

Yesterday we had under consideration the decisions of the courts relative to the right of the executive of a State during a period of insurrection to proclaim martial law. It seemed to be conceded that ordinarily this right existed, but for some reason, unknown to me at least, it was questionable in the minds of some as to whether or not that general rule was applicable to West Virginia.

Now, in the first place, considerable anxiety seemed to be expressed at the proclamation of the governor for the organization of a military commission. I can probably no better present my views upon that than by reading from a decision of a distinguished court, it is true a decision that has been very severely criticized, but an opinion that the Supreme Court of the United States has not passed upon as yet, an opinion founded on former decisions of said great tribunal.

Military commissions are courts organized under the international law of war for the trial of offenses committed during war by those not in the war or naval forces.

Now, for a moment let us consider what the Supreme Court of the United States has held, as has also the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, and it might be well to digress for a moment and call attention to that decision, reported in Two hundred and sixth Pennsylvania, page 165, the Commonwealth ex rel. Wadsworth against Shortall. I am reading the syllabus:

MARTIAL LAW—GOVERNMENT—RIOTS—ORDER OF GOVERNOR.

Martial law exists wherever the military arm of the government is called into service to suppress disorder and restore the public peace.

Where the governor of the Commonwealth issues a general order calling out the militia for the purpose of suppressing violence and maintaining public peace in a district affected by a strike, such an order is a declaration of qualified martial law in the affected district. It is qualified in that it is put in force only as to the preservation of the public peace and order, and not for the ascertainment or vindication of private rights or the other ordinary functions of government. For these the courts and other agencies of the law are still open. But within its necessary field and for the accomplishment of its intended purpose it is martial law with all its powers.

The resort to the military arm of the government by such an order means that the ordinary civil officers to preserve order are subordinated, and the rule of force under military methods is substituted to whatever extent may be necessary in the discretion of the military commander.

The effect of martial law is to put into operation the powers and methods vested in the commanding officer by military law. So far as his powers for the preservation of order and security of life and property are concerned, there is no limit but the necessities and exigency of the situation. And in this respect there is no difference between a public war and domestic insurrection. What has been called the paramount law of self-defense, common to all countries, has established the rule that whatever force is necessary is also lawful.

Governor Hatfield issued his proclamation. He issued it by virtue of a statute of West Virginia long ago, in substance, incorporated in the code of that State, founded on the rules of war, referred to in the decisions alluded to.

As to the direct question propounded by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], which, conceding the right of the governor to issue his proclamation, nevertheless questions the power of the military commission to proceed under the same, I beg to say that—

Military commissions are courts organized under the international law of war for the trial of offenses committed during war by persons not in the land or naval forces.

Now, we have had no court-martial trials in West Virginia. All this talk about "the sentences of drumhead courts-martial" is not properly in this case or before the Senate. A military commission was formed, and the order creating it has been severely criticized. We are not very familiar with military commissions or military courts, and I am glad of it, and the Senate, I doubt not, is glad of it. They come but seldom, but in time of insurrection and war they are not unusual. I quote:

In the United States their jurisdiction is confined to enemy territory occupied by an invading army, or at least to those sections of the country which are properly subject to martial law, and their authority ceases with the end of the war. (40 Cyc., 391.) By a practice dating from 1847 and renewed and firmly established during the Civil War, military commissions have become adopted as authorized tribunals in this country in time of war. They are simply criminal war courts, resorted to for the reason that the jurisdiction of courts-martial, creatures as they are of statute, is restricted by law and can not be extended to include certain classes of offenses which in war would go unpunished in the absence of a provisional forum for the trial of the offenders. Their authority is derived from the law of war, though in some cases their powers have been added to by statute. Their competency has been recognized not only in acts of Congress but in Executive proclamations, in rulings of the courts, and in the opinions of Attorneys General. During the Civil War they were employed in several thousand cases; more recently they were resorted to under the "reconstruction" act of 1867; and still later one of these courts has been convened for the trial of Indians as offenders against the laws of war.

The Judge Advocate General of the Army has collated these commissions, the numbers of cases that they have tried and disposed of, and in his digest, on page 1066, is found the quotation that I have used as also the following:

The jurisdiction of a military commission is derived primarily and mainly from the law of war, but special authority has in some cases been devolved upon it by express legislation, as has already been noticed. Military commissions are authorized by the laws of war to exercise jurisdiction over two classes of offenses committed, whether by civilians or military persons, either (1) in the enemy's country during its occupation by our Army and while it remains under military government, or (2) in the locality not within the enemy's country or necessarily within the theater of war, in which martial law has been established by competent authority.

The digest goes on to cite a great many cases that have been so disposed of by military courts, and says:

Although there is no express provision of the Constitution or acts of Congress authorizing military commissions, yet such commissions are tribunals now as well known and recognized in the laws of the United States as the court-martial. They have been repeatedly recognized by the executive, legislative, and judicial departments of the Government as tribunals for the trial of military offenses.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. GOFF. I do.

Mr. POMERENE. May I ask the Senator from West Virginia from whose opinion he is reading?

Mr. GOFF. I am now reading a quotation from the opinion of the Supreme Court of West Virginia; but the citations that I have alluded to, taken from that opinion, are from the Digest of the Judge Advocate General to which I just referred:

A military commission—

This is still the digest—

A military commission, unlike a court-martial, is exclusively a war court; that is, it may legally be convened and assume jurisdiction only in time of war, or of martial law or military government when the civil authority is suspended.

Mr. President, this is a serious subject, worthy of the attention and consideration of all of the Senate. You can not conduct a war with kid gloves on. War is necessarily harsh; it has been recognized as such from the earliest civilization. While we abhor it, still this country has not failed to resort to it when the necessity demanded it.

Concede that you do not find this power in the Constitution, concede that there is no congressional enactment on the subject, yet there never was a government organized that did not inherently and impliedly carry with it the power to protect itself. Every State of our Union has that right. It is the right of self-defense. A man driven to the wall does not hesitate to strike with the intent to kill if necessary to preserve his own life.

I wonder when it was that my friends on the other side of the Chamber concluded to abandon that creed, handed down to them from Jefferson, involving the sovereignty of the States. When did they yield it? When did they concede that only the Government of the United States can take charge of these matters, the State necessarily surrendering its dignity, its power, and its right to live by its own edict and action?

It is much easier to find, by the usual rules of construction, in the Constitution of the United States the right of a State to issue such proclamations—to establish such military courts—than it is to find in that Constitution such power inherent in the Federal Government. Yet does anyone undertake to say that the General Government does not possess it, has not exercised it? And do we not all thank God to-day that it did exercise it?

The military commission in West Virginia existed by virtue of proper authority. It tried all cases of all persons caught red-handed in insurrection. Has anyone ever intimated that there was a man or a woman arrested and taken before that court who was not properly so arrested? If so, I have not heard of it. Was anyone convicted by that court who was innocent? Many arraigned before it plead guilty, and with a reprimand and an admonition were discharged.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. GOFF. I do.

Mr. BORAH. Our contention is that it never can be determined whether or not those persons were properly convicted until they come before a tribunal which is recognized under the law as a proper tribunal to try that question. To say that they were guilty is not to meet the question, because, though guilty, they were entitled to a trial in the same manner and under the same laws as if they were innocent. No man stands convicted until he has been convicted in a tribunal which has the jurisdiction to try him.

Mr. GOFF. Mr. President, I am contending that the military court was a proper tribunal to try that question; and I have shown to the Senate that on appeal taken from that military court, the subordinate as also the supreme court of my State held that such persons were properly arrested. That is what my contention is. I say I have demonstrated it, and I say that the judgment of that court should stand as the law until proceedings have been taken under our judicial methods to modify or reverse that judgment of the court. Can anyone properly take issue with me on that?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. GOFF. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. What gave the Supreme Court of West Virginia appellate jurisdiction over a military commission? The Senator from West Virginia has just said that there was an appeal from the commission to the court.

Mr. GOFF. That is correct in the general sense. I will explain it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Very well; I should like to know about it.

Mr. GOFF. The writ of habeas corpus was sued out by those people who were tried by the military court. That writ issued from a civil court, a court of competent jurisdiction, presided over by a judge learned in the law, and he held that they were properly arrested, properly convicted, and legally detained. It went then to the Supreme Court of West Virginia, and that court held as I have indicated.

Mr. CUMMINS. Is it not true that the decision of the Supreme Court of West Virginia was simply that the military commission had jurisdiction to try these offenses?

Mr. GOFF. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. It did not inquire into the guilt or the innocence of those who were tried?

Mr. GOFF. That would have been utterly impossible under the writ of habeas corpus.

Mr. CUMMINS. I understand that perfectly well; but what I wanted——

Mr. GOFF. The only question that can or should be determined by a court of competent jurisdiction on a writ of habeas corpus is, Did the court that tried this petitioner have jurisdiction of the matter? Now, what is the presumption of law?

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely. I simply wanted that to be perfectly clear in the debate. I thought that some confusion might arise by the suggestion that there had been an appeal from the military commission to the civil authorities of the State.

Mr. GOFF. Well, I did not use the word "appeal" in the sense the Senator has indicated.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Senator from West Virginia is entirely right in his statement that the court of his own State has held that this commission was properly organized and that the proclamation of the governor was a legal proclamation. May I ask another question while I am on my feet?

Mr. GOFF. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. Did any other governor in the whole history of the country ever issue a proclamation similar to the one issued by the governor of West Virginia?

Mr. GOFF. I have not examined the language of all the proclamations that have been issued, and I am therefore unable to answer the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. One more question, which I ask very largely for information. I understood the Senator to say that there had been a great many cases tried in this country by military commissions. Will the Senator, if he has examined into the matter, tell the Senate what cases have been tried by military commissions acting under martial law during the last 50 years? I do not mean that he should recite the cases, but state the class of cases.

Mr. GOFF. Well, I will read now from the opinion of the Judge Advocate General.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. GOFF. With pleasure.

Mr. NELSON. I can recall one case, and that is the case of the Indians who assassinated Gen. Canby when he went to them under a flag of truce to negotiate peace. Those Indians were tried by a military commission, and the trial was held to be a legal trial. I do not remember its date, but the Senator from Iowa will remember the incident of Gen. Canby's assassination.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I think another case that might be cited is the case in which Gen. Andrew Jackson tried Armstrong and Arbuthnot and executed them; but not even Jackson was ever able to justify the legality of that proceeding. And John C. Calhoun is said to have denounced it as murder.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. GOFF. I yield.

Mr. WORKS. The point has been made here that, conceding the fact that a state of insurrection or war had been declared by the governor, the military tribunal would have no jurisdiction over an offense committed against the State laws. That question is one of jurisdiction, and would be directly involved in the proceedings under habeas corpus. Therefore, as to that question, these parties unquestionably have had their day in court. Whether they were guilty of the specific offense charged is another matter, and that is a matter, in my judgment, about which the Senate has no reason to inquire.

Mr. CUMMINS. Unquestionably, Mr. President, the court of last resort of West Virginia has held that the action of the governor was authorized and has held that the military commission was properly organized and had jurisdiction, not only of offenses against the martial law, which was substituted for the civil law by the order, but had jurisdiction of all offenses against the law of the State as that law was prior to the insurrection. It has not only affirmed an order which so declared, but it has also affirmed an order which gave to the military commission the power to punish by death what formerly was punishable by fine or imprisonment, or to punish by imprisonment an offense that was formerly punishable by death. The order is complete and comprehensive, and the Supreme Court of West Virginia, as I understand, has affirmed its validity.

I do not agree with the Supreme Court of West Virginia with regard to its construction of the law, although I yield to it very great respect, as I do to all the courts in the country. But I was trying to find out whether any other governor in the history of the United States had ever issued such an order as is under review in the Senate at this moment. I knew the Senator from West Virginia had examined the matter and that if there was any precedent for it, he would be able to give it to us.

Mr. GOFF. I have not, as I said a moment ago, examined the proclamations and orders of the different executives of the various States bearing upon that point. I know they were issued; but I have not examined them and therefore will not undertake to answer that inquiry; but I will answer the question the Senator asked me a moment ago.

> Of the ordinary crimes taken cognizance of under similar circumstances by these tribunals, the most frequent were homicide, and after these robbery, aggravated assault and battery, larceny, receiving stolen property, rape, arson, burglary, riot, breach of the peace, attempt to bribe public officers, embezzlement and misappropriation of public money or property, defrauding or attempting to defraud the United States.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. GOFF. I do.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator has read a long list of classes of cases that have been taken cognizance of by tribunals of this character. Now, can the Senator tell us how those tribunals were constituted—that is, whether or not they were tribunals constituted by the governor of a State after the declaration of martial law, or whether they were tribunals incident to the military government of a conquered territory?

Mr. GOFF. The list that I have just read comprises offenses that were committed and tried by military courts established by the commanding general or the President during the Civil War.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Well, Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me further, I quite understand that where a military government has been established as a result of or as incident to war, and where the sovereignty of the enemy has been driven out of existence, military courts may be established; but I understand the rule—and I invite the Senator's attention to that proposition—I understand the rule to be confined to those military governments; that is, if we were engaged in a war with a foreign country, with Mexico, for example, and our troops were in the field in Mexico, and we had driven out that Government, there being no other government capable of administering civil justice, as a matter of necessity the military organization would establish courts, and as a matter of necessity the will of the commanding officer would in effect become the law. As I understand, however, a State has no right to declare war; it has no right to engage in war, unless it is invaded or in grave danger of being invaded; so that it would seem to me to be an improper statement to say that a state of war exists in West Virginia at this time. Undoubtedly, there were circumstances of disturbances—riots and insurrection, if you please—which would justify the governor in declaring martial law; but when he had declared the existence of a state of affairs which authorized him to declare martial law, and he had declared martial law, then the military force would simply be authorized to do what the civil executive officers were unable to do—make arrests and preserve the peace—but notwithstanding that, all the courts would be in existence, and when an arrest was made by the military authorities, just as when an arrest was made by the sheriff of the county, the person arrested charged with a crime, it seems to me, would have the right to demand that his case should be taken before the civil courts which were in existence.

Now, if the Senator will bear with me just for one moment further, I will say to the Senator that this is a question which has troubled me very greatly. I recognize the gravity of any action which the Senate might take looking to an investigation of the affairs of a sovereign State, and I recognize that it ought not to be done except upon very grave occasions; and yet, if the view which I have in mind with reference to this matter is the correct view, then the military authorities of West Virginia have been guilty of very grave usurpation of power, men have been deprived of their right to resort to the civil courts, and it presents a question, as it seems to me, under the fourteenth amendment; and it would seem, in that view of it, to present a case where the Senate would be justified in ordering an investigation. The order which was issued by the governor, among other things, contains this language:

> 1. The military commission is substituted for the criminal courts of the district covered by the martial-law proclamation, and all offenses against the civil laws as they existed—

That is, as the laws existed—

> prior to the proclamation of November 15, 1912, shall be regarded as offenses under the military law, and as a punishment therefor the military commission can impose such sentences, either lighter or heavier than those imposed under the civil law, as in their judgment the offender may merit.

Now, if I understand the force of that order, it is not only that the power of the military authority is substituted for the authority of the courts to try offenses, but the will of the military tribunal is substituted for the law of the State. The law of the State declares that such and such acts shall constitute an offense. The law of the State prescribes that when that offense is committed certain prescribed punishment shall follow. This order says not only that the courts shall not try those cases and that this military tribunal shall try them, but that the law which declares the punishment is superseded and the will of the military authorities takes its place.

If the Senator has any precedent for that, if it has been held by any court in the United States, save by the court of West Virginia, that that sort of an order could be justified under our form of government, I should like very much to have the Senator from West Virginia call our attention to it.

Mr. GOFF. I will say to the Senator from Utah that the governor of West Virginia, when he issued that proclamation, simply put in concise terms an instruction to the court he had established that was drawn from the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, as well as the Supreme Court of West Virginia. Why do I say that? Because the Supreme Court has said, as have all other courts, that a state of insurrection, of riot, in any one of the States produces the same situation in law that actual war does. That is what I mean. That is how I answer these questions.

If there were actual war in West Virginia in the sense the Senator from Utah alluded to—as in the case of a conflict with Mexico—there would be no necessity of alluding to riot or insurrection. Therefore the Supreme Court, in disposing of these questions that involve riot and insurrection, says that the governor of the State may do just exactly those things that he might do if the actual war that the Senator alludes to were existing.

That is what the governor did. Was he wrong? It may be that he was. I do not think he was. Men differ about these things. It is well we do differ about many things. That was his conclusion. He had able advisers. He simply read into his proclamation the legal effect of his order. It was to guide the military commission, to simplify the situation. They would have been bewildered—any of us not familiar with such matters would have been—not have known what to do, or how to proceed, or what they might do if the governor had not advised them.

Looking at the decisions, including even the Milligan case, the Supreme Court holds, instructs us—I am not sure that I use the exact words, but I am confident that in substance it said, under circumstances similar to those existing in West Virginia when the governor issued his martial-law order—

> The military process is substituted for the civil process.

The governor, then, simply said to his commission, "I advise you that the law is as set forth in my orders." Martial law was proclaimed in a small section only and was not to exist in any other part of the State. It is just as I illustrated it yesterday. It was only in this part of the Chamber, at this desk—which is in the riot zone, so to speak—that the military court had jurisdiction.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. GOFF. I do.

Mr. KERN. Is it not true that the governor of Colorado, in directing the arrest of citizens of that State, simply ordered them detained and then turned over to the civil courts for trial? Was not that the extent of the authority which he undertook to exercise?

Mr. GOFF. That may be.

Mr. KERN. Is it not so stated?

Mr. GOFF. I am not aware as to whether or not a proclamation was issued there that gave any special directions. But does it follow because that course was taken in Colorado that it should also be taken in other places? Why, not at all.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. GOFF. I do.

Mr. REED. The Senator from West Virginia has stated that this riotous condition was limited to a very small territory. I wish to be clear as to whether or not the ordinary civil and criminal tribunals of the county in which this territory was situated were in full operation. Were the ordinary courts of justice open and in a condition to transact business?

Mr. GOFF. The ordinary courts of justice in the strike zone, as we will call it, consisted of courts held by justices of the peace, in effect.

Mr. REED. If the Senator will pardon me, I will state the point I am trying to get at, and I am trying to get at it for the purpose of obtaining light. There was a strike zone, a zone in which there was riot and disturbance and disorder, and I apprehend, from what has been said here, of a very aggravated kind. But were not the ordinary criminal and civil courts or the courts having criminal and civil jurisdiction in that county in a condition to proceed unobstructed by the strike?

Mr. GOFF. Outside of the strike zone?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. GOFF. Most undoubtedly.

Mr. REED. Could not a man arrested for a criminal act within the strike zone have been taken outside of the strike zone, before the ordinary court of the county, and have been tried without difficulty?

Mr. GOFF. He might have been, but in my judgment it would have been utterly improper for him to have been so tried.

Mr. REED. I was simply trying to ascertain the fact.

Mr. GOFF. Very well.

Mr. REED. May I ask a further question? As I understand, then, it is conceded that these courts were open, and that the processes of justice went on unobstructed. Does the Senator think those courts would have performed their duty, and would have punished crime, if the criminal had been properly brought before the court with proper evidence?

Mr. GOFF. In the first place, the courts to which the Senator has alluded would have no jurisdiction of a crime outside of assault and battery.

Mr. REED. I do not want to have any misunderstanding with the Senator. I will say to the Senator that I am not asking these questions for the purpose of being antagonistic to him.

Mr. GOFF. I hope I have not intimated anything of that kind.

Mr. REED. In West Virginia you have a court that has general criminal jurisdiction in each county, I take it?

Mr. GOFF. Yes, sir.

Mr. REED. That court was held at the county seat of the county in which this strike zone existed; and that court was constantly open for the transaction of business during the strike, as it would have been at any other time. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. GOFF. That is correct.

Mr. REED. Was there any such condition existing in that county as would have made it impossible or difficult for that court to have administered justice in the case of a man who was arrested within the strike zone and brought before it?

Mr. GOFF. I have said repeatedly, and I am glad of an opportunity to say it once more, that all the courts in West Virginia were open, are open, have been open, are held by distinguished judges, and cases are expeditiously and properly disposed of, except in the strike zone.

Mr. REED. Coming now to the Senator's illustration, if he will pardon me, he states that he will consider this Chamber to represent the State of West Virginia and his desk to represent the strike zone. Suppose an act of violence were committed at the point indicated as his desk, the strike zone. As I understand him that would be within a certain county, and the man guilty of the act of violence would have been tried within that county, in a court presided over by a distinguished judge, and the processes of justice would not have been interfered with at all by the strike condition. The court would have been held, a jury would have been impaneled, and justice would have been administered. That was the condition of affairs, as I understand?

Mr. GOFF. Very well.

Mr. REED. Now, I desire to ask the Senator this question: With that court open, presided over by a distinguished judge, with the processes of justice unobstructed, with the certainty of conviction in a proper case, does he think the governor of the State was justified in setting aside the laws of the State, or of attempting to set them aside, and improvising a criminal tribunal composed of militia officers to try men and impose serious penalties? Does he think he was justified in doing that when the courts of West Virginia were open, and had been duly organized, and were presided over by men of distinction and learning and ability?

Mr. GOFF. Had the governor of West Virginia made any effort to place any other part of the territory of that State in the condition in which he placed the zone, he could not and would not have been upheld a moment of time.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. GOFF. I do.

Mr. WORKS. The Senator from Missouri is asking the Senator from West Virginia as to what condition of things existed at that time. Necessarily the proclamation of the governor of the State placing this particular territory under martial law was founded upon the fact that the conditions were such that the courts could not perform their ordinary functions. That is a question which the governor himself must determine and as to the correctness of which the Senate of the United States has no power to inquire. There is no reason why we should investigate as to that particular phase of it, because I understand the courts have held time and again that the governor of the State has the right to determine that question, and his determination of it is conclusive.

Mr. BORAH. Will the Senator permit me to say a word in answer to what the Senator from California has said?

Mr. GOFF. I will.

Mr. BORAH. If it be true that the governor of a State may declare a territory within the State in insurrection, of course he may declare the entire State under martial law. If it be true that after he has declared martial law he may supplant the civil authority and the civil law and try men by court-martial, then there is positively nothing left of our institutions as we have understood them. There is no crime, there is no offense, which he may not try in his own way and with his own improvised tribunal. If the fact that he has declared the State to be in insurrection be conclusive, and these other things follow as a result of that conclusion, and the United States Government must stand and look on and see it proceed, we can be Mexicanized inside of 48 hours. Now, the governor can declare martial law, but he can not thereby suspend all provisions of the Constitution and nullify the law of the land.

Mr. GOFF. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho may put that construction upon what has taken place in West Virginia if he wishes.

Mr. BORAH. I was assuming that if the Senator from California was correct in his position and we were powerless to examine into the matter, that was what would follow. I do not say that has followed in West Virginia. I have avoided discussing these facts, which I do not desire to discuss until the investigation has been had and we know precisely what happened. But the Senator from West Virginia must recognize the fact that if the proclamation of the governor is conclusive, and if it follows as a matter of law, as a matter of right, or as a matter of authority from that proclamation that he may supplant the civil authority and do away with the civil courts and try men by military tribunal for the violation of State laws, the theory of a right to trial by jury is a mere theory. Now, we will not disagree as to the power of the governor to declare martial law, but we disagree as to what follows as a result of that declaration.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. GOFF. With pleasure.

Mr. NELSON. Partly in response to the question suggested by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] and partly in reference to doubts expressed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], I beg leave to read the following paragraph from Benet's Military Law on the subject of courts-martial. It is very brief, and I trust the Senator will not object to my reading it:

JURISDICTION.

Military offenses under the rules and articles of war must be tried in the manner therein directed, by courts-martial; but military offenses which do not come within the statute must be tried and punished under the laws of war, by military commissions. Many offenses, however, which in time of peace are civil offenses, become in time of war military offenses, and the offenders are to be tried by a military tribunal, even in places where civil tribunals exist.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have no doubt whatever of the right of a military commission not only to try criminal offenses, so called, but to try civil cases. It can award judgment for the plaintiff against the defendant for the recovery of money. The question is, What conditions must exist in order to warrant the military commission?

In addition to what the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has said, I desire to ask the Senator from West Virginia if this further consequence would not follow if the conclusion or the finding or proclamation of the governor were conclusive. Of course he can supplant the legislature just as easily as he can supplant the courts. There is no such thing as a legislature under military law, for there is no need of a legislature. The commanding general makes the law, and I think there are circumstances under which he must make it. But I am sure it would not be contended that the governor of West Virginia could issue a proclamation placing the whole State under martial law, supplanting the general assembly, supplanting the courts, and substituting for both the will of the commanding general. I do not believe the Senator from West Virginia will go to that length.

Mr. GOFF. If there is insurrection throughout the limits of the State of West Virginia, the governor has the same right to designate the entire State as being under the rule of martial law; and, using the language of the Supreme Court of the United States, the commander in chief in that State would control it by his own will, because that is the law of war.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, suppose there is no insurrection in the State of West Virginia, but the governor of West Virginia declares that there is a state of insurrection and issues a proclamation?

Mr. GOFF. Oh, that is a violent assumption.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly; but in order to arrive at the logical conclusion, to which we must go if we are going to follow this matter, we must assume that such a condition of affairs could exist. Suppose he should do it; suppose that the governor, not of West Virginia but of some other State, should do it; then the supposition would not be so violent perhaps. Does the Senator say we could not inquire into the conditions which prevailed in the State as a result of declaring martial law?

Mr. GOFF. Not the Senate of the United States.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator say no one else could—neither the courts nor anybody else?

Mr. GOFF. I am not prepared to say that.

Mr. BORAH. Then it is a very easy job to change our form of government.

Mr. GOFF. No; it is a violent supposition that a man elected to the executive office of any of the States of this Nation would presume to take any such action as the Senator from Idaho has indicated.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the very object and purpose of the fathers in framing our form of government as they did, and putting these limitations upon it, was on the theory that somebody might do that very thing. It was to get away from the gentlemen who had done those things that we rebelled and set up our form of government.

Mr. GOFF. And we have established a government that from that time down to this has never given us one isolated instance of conduct on the part of an executive such as the Senator from Idaho has alluded to. They have never taken such action; and I say it is a violent assumption to assume that they would do so in any State of the American Union.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator lays considerable stress upon the proposition that that has not been done "down to this time."

Mr. GOFF. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. I concede that proposition, but the question we are now discussing is whether this is not a precedent.

Mr. GOFF. I understood the Senator to indicate that he believed the governor had the right to proclaim martial law, and to prescribe the zone within which it should prevail.

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. GOFF. Very well.

Mr. BORAH. But I do not concede that the governor of the State has the right to close the courts, or to supplant the civil authorities, or to ignore the provisions of the Constitution.

Mr. GOFF. The Senator is right.

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. GOFF. One minute, in answer to that suggestion. The governor does not close the courts. It is the absolute, inevitable result of war that closes courts and establishes martial law. That is what it is.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I should like to read at this point a single sentence from the Milligan case, because it answers the whole controversy, as it seems to me, over which the discussion has ranged to-day:

The Constitution of the United States is a law for rulers and people, equally in war and in peace, and covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men, at all times, and under all circumstances.

Mr. GOFF. That is true. Now, will the Senator take the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Moyer case? Are we not to read these decisions and to construe them in the light of the situation existing when the decision is rendered?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Moyer case sustained no other principle than the right of the executive to police the situation and to execute the processes of the civil authorities when the civil authorities themselves could not execute them.

Mr. GOFF. The principle laid down in the Moyer case, in the language of the court, was that pending an insurrection of that character the very process of the civil courts was superseded by the process of the military authorities.

Mr. BORAH. The process—exactly.

Mr. GOFF. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. If I may be permitted to say so, when we had the difficulties in the Coeur d'Alene region we sometimes brought the prisoners, we brought the witnesses, to the court oftentimes in the company of soldiers, for the reason that the riotous conditions were such that the processes of the court could not be served otherwise; but that was simply the execution of the process of the court. It was not an attempt to supplant the trial of a court. Martial law may accompany a citizen to the courthouse steps, but it can not enter the courthouse so long as the courthouse door is open.

Mr. GOFF. My idea is that a court that is held to try prisoners that are taken before it by soldiers is a court that necessarily is inefficient in the discharge of its duties.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, we succeeded in that instance.

Mr. GOFF. Very well; you may have. But is it not preposterous to assume that the courts are to be kept open by military guard and that it requires the strong arm of war, of soldiery, to conduct prisoners to their doors? Why, the very statement of the case, it seems to me, shows the utter folly of trying to hold court under such circumstances.

Mr. BORAH. That is exactly the line of demarcation between martial law and civil law, and it is a matter of common law. Martial law may police; it may keep order; but that is the extent to which it may go. It can go no further.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It may arrest.

Mr. BORAH. I say, it may keep order.

Mr. GOFF. We have cited here case after case from the Supreme Court of the United States in which exactly the contrary has been held. That is the Luther versus Borden case. You know that is the decision of the Supreme Court.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Luther versus Borden case, if the Senator will permit me for a moment——

Mr. GOFF. I will. I should like to have the Senator explain it in any other light if he can.

Mr. BORAH. The Luther versus Borden case went no further than to establish that exact proposition. What was the Luther versus Borden case? As we know, Rhode Island at the time of the formation of the Union remained under the old royal charter—the charter from the King. A certain portion of her people became tired of that charter; they formed a different constitution and voluntarily met together for that purpose. The main question in that case was as to which should prevail—the Royal Government, under the royal charter, or the one which had been organized by the voluntary meeting of the citizens. That was the main proposition.

During this controversy between the two State governments martial law was declared, however, and in the execution of the processes of the authorities a house was broken into for the purpose of arresting and detaining a person who was acting in violation of law. They went no further. The man was not tried by any military tribunal. He was simply arrested. The processes of the law were executed by the military authorities. But Chief Justice Taney says in that very decision that they may go so far as to restrain the violence of the citizen, but if they proceed any further they must be responsible to the civil authorities for what they do. Let me read that:

It was a state of war; and the established government resorted to the rights and usages of war to maintain itself, and to overcome the unlawful opposition. And in that state of things the officers engaged in its military service might lawfully arrest anyone who, from the information before them, they had reasonable grounds to believe was engaged in the insurrection; and might order a house to be forcibly entered and seached, when there were reasonable grounds for supposing he might be there concealed. Without the power to do this martial law and the military array of the government would be mere parade, and rather encourage attack than repel it. No more force however, can be used than is necessary to accomplish the object. And if the power is exercised for the purposes of oppression, or any injury willfully done to person or property, the party by whom, or by whose order, it is committed would undoubtedly be answerable. (U. S. 48, Howard's Reports, p. 45.)

Now, let me read another citation here, while I am on my feet; and I read it for the reason that, in my judgment, a thousand years ago this line of demarcation was laid down and has never been departed from by any Anglo-Saxon court.

Lord Coke says (in 3 Inst., 52): "If a lieutenant, or other that hath commission of martial authority in time of peace, hang or otherwise execute any man by color of martial law, this is murder." "Thom. Count de Lancaster, being taken in open insurrection, was by judgment of martial law put to death," and this, though during an insurrection, was adjudged to be murder, because done in time of peace, and while the courts of law were open. (U. S. 48, Howard's Reports, p. 64.)

Now, there is the line of demarcation.

Mr. GOFF. Because done in time of peace.

Mr. BORAH. But in time of insurrection.

Mr. GOFF. That does not mean, though, if it was done in the district where the insurrection existed. That is what I mean.

Now, the Senator has read from the Supreme Court in the Luther versus Borden case a portion. Let us see what else the court says:

And, unquestionably, a State may use its military power to put down an armed insurrection too strong to be controlled by the civil authority. The power is essential to the existence of every government, essential to the preservation of order and free institutions, and is as necessary to the States of this Union as to any other government. The State itself must determine what degree of force the crisis demands. And if the government of Rhode Island deemed the armed opposition so formidable and so ramified throughout the State as to require the use of its military force and the declaration of martial law, we see no ground upon which this court can question its authority.

The declaration of martial law proclaims the inability of the civil courts to maintain order, to enforce their process, to subdue insurrection.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, that is where I differ with the Senator.

Mr. GOFF. I know you do; but that is what the authorities enunciate.

Mr. BORAH. The declaration of martial law need not interfere with the civil courts at all, and, in my judgment, it can not interfere with the civil courts. There is not any power in this Government to supplant the civil authorities or the common law of the country or the statutory law of the country through the power of martial law.

Mr. GOFF. Not except during the existence of the insurrection; certainly not; but during that it must exist.

Mr. BORAH. But the martial law goes to the extent of restraining the violence, of policing the situation, and no further.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. GOFF. I do.

Mr. REED. I just wanted to ask, as a matter of information, who constituted the military tribunal before whom these people were tried, if the Senator knows, personally, of course?

Mr. GOFF. I can not give you their names; but they were members of the military corps in that zone, some of them.

Mr. REED. Were they officers of the militia or were they men trained in the law, judges, or men of that kind?

Mr. GOFF. I think they were officers of the militia.

Mr. REED. Can the Senator tell us under what rule of law they tried the men? I notice in this order the statement is made that the military tribunal may impose heavier penalties or lighter penalties than are provided by law. I take it the civil law was wiped out. Now, under what law, by what rule, did they adjudge these men? There being no civil law, where did they get their law? Had there been any proclamation defining crime? Had there been anything by which a man could tell whether he had violated the law or not until he was brought before that tribunal and found out what that tribunal of military officers considered a violation?

Mr. GOFF. I have endeavored several times to explain the theory that the governor acted on, and on which he based his proclamation. That, again, is this, and it answers the Senator's question: He took the position that I think he was justified in taking, that the insurrection on Paint and Cabin Creeks was of such a character as to render it absolutely necessary for him, in the discharge of his duty, in protecting the citizenship and the dignity of the State, as under the decisions of the courts made his will the law—made him, as commander in chief, virtually a dictator in the martial zone. Unless you concede that right, unless the governor of a State, when he issues a proclamation of that kind, when he declares the existence of martial law, has the supreme power as the usages of war give him, unless that power exist to him he might just as well not issue the proclamation.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon a further question, I think I understand the Senator's position. It is that the governor had the power to issue an order placing this section of his State under martial law.

The question I am trying to get at is what this martial law consisted of in that territory. To illustrate what I mean: I have always understood that when a country was actually placed under martial law in time of actual war the authority declaring it under martial law proceeded to issue the law, to issue an order to the inhabitants which prescribed the offenses and warned them against committing the offenses, and then in case of a violation of that order in time of actual war a military offender would be tried by a military tribunal. But in this case I want to know whether there was any order issued, any statement ever made to the people as to what would constitute offenses, or whether men were simply dragged before this military commission by the soldiery and put upon trial for having violated martial law, and what that martial law was rested solely in the breast of the commission, and was nowhere else to be found.

Mr. GOFF. The Senator is mistaken about that. The governor did issue his proclamation. The governor did state, as I endeavored to explain a few moments ago, what the punishment should be, except in some cases that they might make it heavier or less. The crimes he referred to were all specified in our statutes, defined in our code, and it was these offenses that the military commission was given jurisdiction over. The governor, as a matter of fact, was commander in chief, and under the usages of war, as it has existed almost from time immemorial, his will was law. You will all recall the decision in the Butler case, which originated in New Orleans during the Civil War, in which the Supreme Court of the United States held in just so many words that the will of Gen. Butler was supreme law at New Orleans. That is what I am trying to explain to the Senate—that the governor when he so acted, acted as I say the Supreme Court had given him authority to do. The military court, if you wish to so call it, was his agent; it acted for him, for he could not be everywhere. He reserved the right to supervise its proceedings, which he always did with justice and with mercy. When war or insurrection prevails because of which martial law exists—fearful as it is to even contemplate—nevertheless the situation must be met with an iron hand, if not peace will never return and law and order will forever disappear.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. GOFF. I do.

Mr. SIMMONS. I simply desire to say to the Senator from West Virginia that we had something in the nature of an understanding about an hour and a half ago. It was not sanctioned by the action of the Senate, but I think there was general assent to it. It was that the matter the Senator is now so ably discussing should be taken up for an hour, and then the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] would ask to lay it aside. I was going to ask the Senator from West Virginia if he would not be willing, in view of that tentative understanding, to postpone his remarks until, say, to-morrow.

Mr. GOFF. Do I understand the Senator from North Carolina to intimate that the Senator from Indiana is willing or anxious that this resolution shall go over? I understood that the situation was so serious that it demanded immediate and urgent attention.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understood the Senator from Indiana to state that in an hour he would ask that it might go over. The Senator from Indiana has been pressing the resolution with great vigor, I think, but in deference to the wishes of a great many Senators that the matter with reference to the tariff bill should be disposed of, the Senator, as I understood him, stated that at the end of an hour he would ask that the resolution be temporarily laid aside. I trust the Senator from West Virginia will acquiesce in that course and permit us to proceed with the motion.

Mr. GOFF. Will the Senator from North Carolina advise me clearly and fully what it is he desires to take up and dispose of?

Mr. SIMMONS. It is the motion to refer the tariff bill to the Finance Committee.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And what we desired, Mr. President, was to know if the Senator from West Virginia would yield to allow us to displace the matter now before the Senate and take up the motion referring the tariff bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. I did not understand——

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am not in charge of the resolution, but I am sufficiently interested in it to say that I would not consent to a motion being made which would displace it. If the Senator from Indiana, in the exercise of his judgment, shall ask to have it temporarily laid aside, I think there will be no objection.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understood that that is what the Senator said he would do at the end of an hour.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

Mr. GOFF. I yielded yesterday when I was discussing this proposition right in the midst of the discussion of a case which I had cited from the Supreme Court. Now the same proposition comes to me, and unless there is some urgency about the matter that I do not at this time realize I beg to be excused.

Mr. SIMMONS. Of course the Senator recognizes that there is no disposition to take him off his feet without his consent. I supposed, in view of the statement made by the Senator from Indiana that at the end of an hour he would ask the Senate to temporarily lay the unfinished business aside, by reason of which statement I did not make a motion to proceed with the consideration of the motion to refer the tariff bill to the committee, the Senator from West Virginia would agree to yield.

Mr. GOFF. Is it the wish of the members of the Finance Committee—and I am speaking now of those upon both sides of the aisle—that this course should be taken?

Mr. SIMMONS. It is the wish of the majority members of the Finance Committee. I do not know what may be the wish of the minority members.

Mr. PENROSE. I think the minority members of the Finance Committee are anxious to have a vote on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina at as early a time as possible.

Mr. KERN. I am very anxious to have the matter which is now under discussion disposed of, and I have so expressed myself at all times. I know, or thought I knew, that all the members of the Finance Committee desire a vote on the question of the reference of the tariff bill. In view of that, I said it would be entirely agreeable to me, and at the expiration of an hour I would ask that the pending business be temporarily laid aside until that vote was taken. It was suggested by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] that if at the end of an hour there was some speaker on his feet the request should not be made. I assured him and the Senate that any speaker on his feet would be treated with courtesy.

If the Senator from West Virginia is to be inconvenienced, of course I will not make the request. If, however, he could without inconvenience suspend his remarks and let this matter be temporarily laid aside until the vote may be taken to refer the tariff bill in the course of two or three hours, it would be a favor to me and doubtless to all members of the Finance Committee. That is all of the situation.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to assure the Senator from West Virginia that there is an earnest desire, as I understand it, on the part of the Finance Committee that the matter of reference should be disposed of this afternoon.

Mr. WORKS. May I ask the Senator from North Carolina——

Mr. GOFF. Does the temporary delay or suspension the Senator alludes to necessarily mean that the pending matter goes over for to-day?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; it will be taken up as soon as a vote is had on the motion to refer.

Mr. GOFF. What do I understand by two or three hours?

Mr. KERN. It remains the unfinished business.

Mr. SIMMONS. It remains the unfinished business. It is not displaced.

Mr. KERN. If it will accommodate the Senator to let it go over as the unfinished business until to-morrow, we would yield that point to him.

Mr. WORKS. I wanted to ask the Senator from North Carolina whether it would be understood that the resolution is laid aside temporarily only for the purpose of taking a vote upon the motion without the intervention of other business, executive or otherwise.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is my understanding.

Mr. KERN. That is all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from West Virginia has the floor.

Mr. GOFF. I yield to the suggestion of the members of the Finance Committee, if it will be understood that the pending resolution comes up as the unfinished business.

Mr. SIMMONS. I beg pardon of the Senator; I did not hear him.

Mr. GOFF. The resolution will come up as the unfinished business?

Mr. SIMMONS. It does not displace it as the unfinished business. I ask that the resolution——

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I presume we may safely assume that it will not be brought up again to-day.

Mr. KERN. I think it is doubtful; but it is not displaced. It will remain as the unfinished business of the Senate after the motion to refer is disposed of.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I understand that no other intervening business is to occur except the motion to refer.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is the understanding.

Mr. KERN. That is all.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. If it goes over as the unfinished business, it will come up regularly at 2 o'clock to-morrow. It would not preclude the morning business and such other things as may be necessary.

Mr. CRAWFORD. It is not the purpose to take it up again this afternoon?

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand that it is not. I ask that the motion to refer the tariff bill to the Finance Committee be laid before the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. I would suggest to the Senator from Indiana that he had better ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. KERN. I understood that that was implied.

Mr. SMOOT. It has not been done by the Senate.

Mr. KERN. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the pending resolution, which is the unfinished business, be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The effect of that is to carry it over until 2 o'clock to-morrow?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. With that understanding, I do not object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There being no objection, the unfinished business is temporarily laid aside.

THE TARIFF.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina now asks that his motion to refer the tariff bill to the Finance Committee, with amendments thereto, be laid before the Senate. There being no objection, that question is now before the Senate, and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] has the floor.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, when interrupted I was reading an extract from an article by Prof. Taussig which refers to the character of labor employed in the beet fields of the country. I will proceed at the point where the consideration of this subject was suspended:

> Almost everywhere in the beet-sugar districts we find laborers who are employed or contracted for in gangs; an inferior class, utilized and perhaps exploited by a superior class. The agricultural laborers in the beet fields are usually a very different set from the farmers. On the Pacific coast they are Chinese or Mexicans. Except in southern California, where the Mexicans are near at hand, most of the work is done by Japanese under contract, there being usually a head contractor, a sort of sweater, who undertakes to furnish the men. In very recent years Hindus (brought down from British Columbia) also have appeared in the beet fields of California. In Colorado "immigrants from old Mexico compete with New Mexicans (i. e., born in New Mexico), Russians, and Japanese." Indians from the reservation have been employed in Colorado, and boys have been sent out under supervisors from the juvenile court of Denver. At one time convict labor was used in Nebraska.
> In some parts of Colorado, in Montana, and at the beet fields of the single factory in Kansas, Russian Germans are employed. These curious and interesting people are Germans who were imported into Russia by the Empress Katherine; they persistently maintained their race and language and religion; in recent years they have been driven from Russia by persecution. They now center about Lincoln, Nebr., and are shipped under contract to the beet fields, where they are assiduous and much-prized workers. They are much more welcome than the fickle Indians and Mexicans; more welcome even than the Japanese, who are quick and capable, but often break their contracts. The German Russians camp in whole families at the beet region for the summer; men, women, and children toil in the fields. In Michigan the main labor supply comes from the Polish and Bohemian population of Cleveland, Buffalo, and Pittsburgh. The circulars issued by the Department of Agriculture and by the State boards and bureaus repeatedly call the attention of the beet farmers to the possibility of employing cheap immigrants. The troublesome labor problems, it is said, need not cause worry; here is a large supply of just the persons wanted. "Living in cities there is a class of foreigners—Germans, French, Russians, Hollanders, Austrians, Bohemians—who have had more or less experience in beet growing in their native countries. * * * Every spring sees large colonies of this class of workmen moving out from our cities into the beet fields."

Now, my criticism of this condition is not aimed at the workers as such nor at the work itself. It is aimed at the fact that if protection is needed for this industry because of the problems of labor involved in it, then that protection does not benefit the citizens of this country, but is for a class some of whom may become citizens, some of whom are precluded from becoming citizens, but all of whom belong to that class which under the system of protection is undermining the employment of Americans and substituting for them in all the varied lines of highly protected pursuits a class of people who ought not to be so employed to the exclusion of our own people unless it is due to the absolute necessity of conditions beyond the control of men. It is this phase of the question of labor in America which, in my judgment, constitutes its most important and at the same time its most sinister aspect.

It may be that the nature of the work which these people are required to do and for which it is said they are better paid than they would be anywhere else is such that it will not be performed by any other class of people, and therefore these must be employed to do it in this particular industry, and I think that is very largely true. But the necessity which requires this employment is one thing and the contention that high wages are paid to them because of the protection granted by the Government to that industry is quite another thing.

There is another class of labor, of course, which is employed in this industry, a higher class of labor, but which is separate and distinct from the hand labor in the beet fields to which I am now referring. There is still another class in the factories, but its amount is comparatively small, the boast of the beet-sugar refiner being that through improved machinery conditions the human hand does not touch the material from the time the beets are sliced at one end of the factory until the finished product appears ready for the market at the other. Of course, my criticisms do not concern that element.

Mr. President, I willingly concede that there are wages paid by some of these companies which stand in grateful contrast to the rate paid to the common laborer, whatever that rate may be. It is not peculiar to this industry; it is characteristic of all these highly organized and capitalized combinations. It is the wage which is received by the men on top, by the men higher up, and which is also included in the general aggregate of the cost of production, the contrast between the two being as strikingly apparent as it is in other protected industries.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. WORKS. Does the Senator from Colorado mean to be understood that in the amount of wages paid, as I gave them, the higher-up employees were included?

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, no.

Mr. WORKS. My discussion of the subject related entirely, I will have the Senator understand, to workmen in the beet fields.

Mr. THOMAS. I understood that perfectly. I have reference, Mr. President, to the salaries paid by some of these companies to their officials, which, as I have said, is remarkable, if for no other reason, for the contrast presented to the class of laborers and the amount of their wages, which have been here the subject of discussion and which, as I have said, also constitute an item entering into the cost of production. I know of one company which pays its president $35,000 a year.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator name the company?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly. It is the Great Western.

Mr. SMOOT. How many factories has the Great Western Co.?

Mr. THOMAS. They have 9, I think—9 or 10—9 in my State.

Mr. SMOOT. And they pay their president $35,000 a year?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; and they pay the manager $25,000; the vice president $10,000, and the treasurer $5,000. What the scale of wages is below that I do not know; but it is indicative of the fact, Mr. President, that there are two scales of wages in these protected industries—one out of all proportion, in my judgment, in its size; the other never beyond what the market justifies.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator if that is not the case in every vocation of life, and particularly as to the fees in the practice of law?

Mr. THOMAS. I think it is the case, Mr. President, in industries as now organized; and I think that in the law the men who have laboriously acquired a position in the profession, whose abilities and reputation have been established, and particularly when they have been established to such a degree that they appeal to these great combinations, which need those abilities to enable them to graze the edges of the law and avoid its penalties in carrying out their schemes and machinations—some of these are very highly compensated, as I am informed.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, Mr. President, I suppose that the Senator will not confine his comparison to that particular class of attorneys——

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, no.

Mr. SMOOT. Because I am sure the Senator knows just as well as I do that in the great mining suits in the West, when large questions are involved, the men who are interested in those disputes always seek out the man whom they think is most able to present their case in the very best possible way. On the other hand, I never object to the attorney charging for it whether the suit concerns a great corporation or any other kind of a company.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not know whether the Senator's statement is intended for a question or a stump speech.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, not at all. I am only referring to my own personal experience. I will say that I never had the Senator as an attorney in a lawsuit, but I have had experience along that line, and I am speaking from personal experience.

Mr. THOMAS. It is undoubtedly true, Mr. President, that the class of counsel to whom the Senator from Utah refers are not all of them employed in the manner to which I have referred. I plead guilty to the fact also that I have received some pretty good fees in mining cases, and that the work was in many respects more lucrative, if not more agreeable, than the task in which I am now engaged.

Mr. SMOOT. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. But, Mr. President, I do not believe that attorneys, when employed in mining cases or in any other cases, if you please, should be confounded with that class of salaried men whose compensation is included in the cost of production of a given article of commerce, and so included as a reason for continuing a high tariff duty upon the necessities of life upon the theory that the cost of production makes such protection necessary as against foreign competition. I am mentioning this matter in no captious spirit, in no complaining mood. I am not here for the purpose of saying that those gentlemen do not earn their money. I might go further and admit that they do, but it is the contrast to which I wish to focus attention, for it reveals the real beneficiaries of protection as well as the range of compensation which, when the question of cost of production is considered, in its bearing upon the general welfare of the consumers of the country, is carefully kept in the background. I shall say nothing further upon this general subject, but there are one or two other matters which have been discussed in this debate to which I wish to refer before taking my seat.

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], the other day, either misconceived or misconstrued my purpose when I called the attention of the Senate to a circular which was issued by a certain manufacturing concern in the State of New York. He said that I gave an exhibition of brazen effrontery here in asserting that the institutions and industries interested in or affected by the schedules of the Underwood bill should not be heard to remonstrate or to complain, and would be investigated if they did. If I had taken such a position, the criticism of the Senator from Michigan would be just, but I am unconscious of having done so. What I purposed was to focus attention upon what seemed to be a calculated and deliberate attempt to coerce the employees of a great industry into uniting with their employer in bringing pressure to bear upon the Senate of the United States for the purpose of preventing the enactment, in its present form at least, of the Underwood bill.

I said then, and I repeat, that whenever and wherever such conditions manifest themselves, I think it is the duty of Senators on both sides of this Chamber to emphasize the fact and to let the country know it, for, surely, no Senator in this body will contend that any man or corporation, however powerful or however sincere in the apprehension of impending injury or disaster, has any right or authority whatsoever to force the hands of dependent employees by threatening to reduce their wages, by demanding that they write letters or petitions, or by otherwise interfering with their voluntary action, to the end that the legislative policy of this body shall be influenced. Men may petition all they please; they may remonstrate all they please; they may entreat all they please; they may threaten all they please, and prophesy to their heart's content; that is one thing, and no man should interfere, whether his judgment commends or condemns the practice. It is the exercise, however, of authority over others, that is always done on occasions of this kind, that has been done in the course of political campaigns heretofore, and that has determined the result in some of them—it is that evil to which my remarks were directed, Mr. President, an evil that has assumed tremendous proportions in the past, and which would exceed these proportions now were it not for the fact that the present administration is a tariff-revision-downward administration, and is in sympathy with the majority of both Houses of Congress, and, therefore, armed with authority to protect the weak and the dependent from this unwarranted and oppressive requirement. It was therefore, both desirable and just to have done what I did the other day in bringing the matter to the attention of the Senate as soon as the first specific instance of its exercise appeared, and thereby saving a good deal of trouble hereafter.

Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan, in the course of his remarks the other day, emphasized the old contention that any interference with or attempted amendment of tariff schedules, any attempted application of what I think he termed the Democratic idea of finance and of administrative economy to the laws of the country, produced great industrial disturbances and depressions. He drew a picture of the ovation which was paid to Mr. Wilson in the House of Representatives in 1894, on the occasion of the passage of the Wilson tariff bill through that body, and declared that the shoulders which bore him in triumph from that Chamber on that occasion soon afterwards bore a burden so heavy that it took 20 years of time for the party responsible for that measure to regain a sufficient amount of confidence from the American people to get back into power. Of course the inference, if not the assertion itself, was that we are on the threshold of a repetition of those unfortunate conditions, which can only be prevented by the defeat of the present measure or by submitting the task of revision to our friends across the aisle.

Mr. President, I think I can say with perfect impunity that no panic in the past history of this country was ever caused by any attempted reform of the tariff or by a downward revision of tariff schedules; that no such disturbance has ever occurred in the past which can be logically or properly traced to changes or attempted changes in the protective tariff laws of the United States. The Senator is too well acquainted with the history of his country, he is too able a statesman to be ignorant of the fact that the panic to which he alluded the other day was born, reached maturity, and had practically passed its crisis before the Wilson bill became a law.

It was a panic, Mr. President, which had its origin in entirely different causes; it was a panic deliberately produced in this country for the purpose of doing away with a statute of the United States, the operation of which was objectionable to the great financial powers of the country—I refer to what was popularly known as the Sherman silver law, whose repeal was accomplished through the perpetration of the most colossal tragedy of the nineteenth century, regardless of its consequences upon the business interests of the Nation, upon the welfare of the people, upon the general prosperity then everywhere prevalent.

The campaign of 1892 was ostensibly a campaign between two great political parties, with our old familiar friend, the tariff, as the issue between them. Each party nominated its ticket, adopted its platform, organized for the campaign, and made the issue of protection or tariff reform the principal subject of contention. The people supposed that to be the issue; but it was merely the decoy placed before the public for the purpose of arousing and deceiving them, as it did deceive them, while the real purpose of the campaign to be made effective through the election of Mr. Cleveland and the defeat of his opponent involved a tremendous revolution in the financial policy of the country.

Mr. President, I am not going into the history to any very great extent of that frightful period; but I believe that it is necessary at the outset of the consideration and determination by the Senate of this great measure to let the country know what were the real causes of the great industrial disturbances of the past, to the end that this apprehension, this prophecy of disaster, this campaign of prophecies of bad times, may not have the effect upon the public mind which it is designed to have, and which, when entertained, necessarily deters many from a consideration and performance of what the duties and demands of the time require.

I have said that the panic of 1893, ascribed to the change in our tariff policy as contemplated and pledged by the Democratic administration and upon which issue it was supposed to have been elected, was wholly due to other causes. There was a great silver sentiment in those days. It was based upon the best of reasons. Those who believed in bimetalism stood with their feet firmly planted on the Constitution of the United States, and the great heart of the common people everywhere sustained them. They knew, as we knew, that both metals were essential in the performance of their monetary functions to the financial well-being of the country; but the great financial interests of that day, Mr. President, were, and had been for years, absolutely opposed to anything but gold in this country as the ultimate money of redemption, the Constitution to the contrary notwithstanding. Not only that, but they were absolutely opposed to a continuance in circulation of the greenbacks and demanded their retirement. They also coveted the great power of note issue, which belongs to the Government and must belong to every government calling itself such the world over, and which, surrendered to the hands of private interests, would invest them with the most potent engine of sovereignty known to modern civilization.

President Cleveland was elected, and on the 4th day of March, 1893, took his seat. Eight days afterwards, on the 12th day of March, this circular was sent to national banks in the United States:

DEAR SIR: The interests of national bankers require immediate financial legislation by Congress. Silver, silver certificates, and Treasury notes must be retired.

I will read that again:

Silver, silver certificates, and Treasury notes must be retired and the national-bank notes, upon a gold basis, made the only money. This requires the authorization of $500,000,000 to $1,000,000,000 of new bonds as a basis of circulation. You will at once retire one-third of your circulation and call in one-half of your loans. Be careful to make a money stringency felt among your patrons, especially among influential business men. Advocate an extra session of Congress for the repeal of the purchase clause of the Sherman law, and act with other banks of your city in securing a large petition to Congress for its unconditional repeal, as per accompanying form. Use personal influence with Congressmen, and, particularly, let your wishes be known to your Senators.

Then, as now, the votes of Senators seemed to be of supreme importance, perhaps of controlling importance, the House of Representatives being then, as now, too unwieldy and with a majority too great, coming fresh then, as now, from the people, to be influenced in the right direction.

The future life of national banks as fixed and safe investments depends upon immediate action, as there is an increasing sentiment in favor of governmental legal-tender notes and silver coinage.

That circular acted, as a writer upon the subject has well said, "like a bombshell in a glass factory." A third of the bank notes were to be retired from circulation; in other words, millions of circulating money were for all practical purposes to be destroyed and money made as dear as possible. On the other hand, one-half of all the outstanding loans were to be called in. No enginery which the mind of man can conceive, Mr. President, is so powerful as those two agencies combined for the production of widespread and universal national disaster, and it came. And the interests which to-day are declaring their belief that disaster may result from the enactment of legislation designed to reduce the burdens of taxation may, if it becomes necessary from their point of view, precipitate panic through their control of credits and exchanges. I said that that was a conspiracy. There can be no question about it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to ask the Senator if he has the name of the person or the firm sending out that circular letter?

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator will find an account of this subject in the July, 1895, number of The Forum, under an article entitled "Sound currency the dominant political issue."

Mr. NORRIS. Can the Senator not give the name of the author?

Mr. THOMAS. I can not give it at this moment. It emanated from New York City.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator know the bank from which it emanated?

Mr. THOMAS. I do not.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator know how universally the instructions were obeyed which were contained in the circular?

Mr. THOMAS. History answers that.

Mr. NORRIS. I would ask the Senator particularly if the banks did immediately, and for the reason that they were commanded to do so by the circular, call in one-half of all their loans?

Mr. THOMAS. The bankers retired a good part of their circulation and called in their loans, or a great many of them did.

Mr. NORRIS. Those things have occurred, at least to some extent; but I wanted to know, if I could, just how much effect that circular had upon the situation and how well it was obeyed. It seems to me that the ordinary banker would refuse to be dictated to by a letter which absolutely commanded him to call in one-half of his loans.

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, I suppose that there were many bankers who paid no attention to it. I do not mean to say that every person or every institution who received a copy of this circular acted in accordance with it. I know that was not the case in my section of the country.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to ask the Senator if he can give us any information as to how much publicity was given to the circular at the time or about the time it was sent out?

Mr. THOMAS. I can only answer that——

Mr. NORRIS. I should think such a circular would have attracted a good deal of attention everywhere.

Mr. THOMAS. We heard a good deal during the special session of 1893 of an object lesson which had been given to the country. We heard a great deal at that time about the object lesson that had been given the country, and this was the object lesson.

Mr. NORRIS. Did the Senator at the time that it occurred have any knowledge of the circulation of that letter?

Mr. THOMAS. I knew while the debates at the special session of 1893, to which I listened from the gallery, that such a circular had been issued.

Mr. NORRIS. Was evidence given at that time as to who sent it?

Mr. THOMAS. My recollection is that if the Senator will turn to the debates of that memorable special session he will find information upon the subject.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no doubt of that; and I am interrogating the Senator for the purpose of information only. Personally I never heard of that circular, or if I did I have forgotten it. It struck me as being a remarkable thing, and it seemed to me that perhaps the Senator might be able to give me much more definite information in regard to it. Can the Senator inform us as to how general its circulation was? Was it sent to all of the banks?

Mr. THOMAS. My recollection is that it was addressed to the national banks.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that.

Mr. THOMAS. The pamphlet which I have in my possession is an article upon the subject by Allan L. Benson, which appeared in Pearson's Magazine for March, 1912. I shall be very glad to give it to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. Has the Senator any other information as to its actual circulation than what is contained in that article?

Mr. THOMAS. I have referred to the article in The Forum and also to the debates at the special session. That is as much information as I can give the Senator at the present time.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. Now, I should like to ask the Senator, if he will yield further, whether he does not know, as a matter of fact, that this letter could not have been widely circulated, or that, as a matter of fact, it was not something that was generally known all over the country?

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, Mr. President, it was not published in the daily papers. It was not sent to everybody.

Mr. NORRIS. Would it not have been published in the daily papers if it had been sent broadcast?

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, undoubtedly; and if it had been published in the daily papers it would have defeated its purpose.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator does not mean to say that if every banker did receive one he would have been willing to conceal the fact that he had received it?

Mr. THOMAS. I do not think I said that.

Mr. NORRIS. No; I say, the Senator does not want to give that impression?

Mr. THOMAS. No.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, as a matter of fact, if it was sent to all of the bankers in the country, it would naturally have followed that a great many copies would have gotten into other hands and would have been given publicity immediately?

Mr. THOMAS. That depends entirely upon the circumstances under which it was sent. I have no doubt circulars have been sent since then by the same interests.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, I have no doubt of that, either.

Mr. THOMAS. Which desire now to take the power of note issue from the Government of the United States and to retire the outstanding greenbacks.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no doubt but that that has often occurred, but in this particular instance it seems to me a remarkable statement is made. A command emanates from some source telling the bankers how they shall conduct their business, and it seems to me remarkable that it should not have received great publicity at the time.

Mr. THOMAS. The men who control the finances of the United States are very apt to command, and do command, and their commands are generally obeyed.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE], I think, has the preference.

Mr. PAGE. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. ROOT. I did not observe who signed this circular. I did not hear the Senator read the name of the signer.

Mr. THOMAS. I did not give the name of the signer, because there is no signer in the copy I have.

Mr. ROOT. Was this an anonymous circular?

Mr. THOMAS. I do not know, but I do not think it was. I think perhaps the Senator knows better than I do where it came from.

Mr. ROOT. I never heard of it. The idea that any considerable effect would be produced upon the action of the bankers of this country by a circular without any signature seems to me to be rather absurd.

Mr. THOMAS. I am not responsible for the manner in which it strikes the mind of the Senator from New York.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. THOMAS. In a moment. I think the Senator from New York is personally acquainted with Mr. William Solomon, of the great international banking house of Speyer & Co., who perhaps can give him a great deal of information, if he is still living.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I have not the honor of the acquaintance of that gentleman, and if I had I certainly should not expect him to give me more or better information than the Senator from Colorado thinks would justify him as the basis of a speech to the Senate. It is the Senator from Colorado who has produced this circular and has stated that this was the basis of the panic which followed the repeal of the Sherman silver act and the agitation of the Wilson tariff bill. It is his responsibility to tell us what it is; and if he does not know who signed it, or whether it was signed by anyone, then he is taking up the time of the Senate on a very slender foundation of conjecture and suspicion.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado does not have to take instructions from the Senator from New York, either as to this circular or as to anything else. He is responsible to his own people and to the country for what he says, and he proposes to continue this discussion along those lines, however much the Senator from New York may disapprove it.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. THOMAS. I do.

Mr. PAGE. I have great respect for the Senator from Colorado, but I think I was in a position to have known if any such circular as he has described had been sent to all the national banks of this country. I understand the Senator to go farther, and to say that a goodly portion of the banks of the country responded to this letter and reduced their loans as suggested by it.

I am morally certain that, so far as my own State is concerned, there was not a single bank in Vermont that responded to that circular if it came; and I think I am in position to have known the fact if it had existed. I want to say further to the Senator, that if he will investigate the matter and finds that a single bank in Vermont proceeded along the lines suggested in that circular, and will name some benevolent institution in his State that is in need, I will give it a check for $250. I will do that for a single instance of any bank in Vermont that complied with that suggestion, if it was received; and I do not believe any one of them did receive it. Indeed, Mr. President, it seems to me the statement is so preposterous as hardly to require an answer. Still, I have no doubt that the Senator from Colorado makes it in good faith.

Mr. THOMAS. This "preposterous" statement seems to be calling forth a good many answers.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. THOMAS. I do.

Mr. LANE. I will say for the information of the various Senators, while I am not taking any part in this discussion, that I heard rumors that there was such a circular in existence, and inquired of a friend of mine who is and was a national banker and did see the circular. He had received such a circular; it did exist; I read it myself, but I regret to say I have forgotten who signed it. It came from New York. I saw that identical circular, and I was assured by this banker that he acted upon it.

You may have that for just what it is worth. You are entirely welcome to the information.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if the Senator from Colorado does not know the name, and the Senator from Oregon will give us the name of the banker to whom he refers, we can telegraph and find out; perhaps he can remember the name of the gentleman who signed the circular.

Mr. LANE. I must decline to give the name of the banker. He is a friend of mine and is still in the banking business, and I fear that it would be disastrous to him.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator from Oregon is very wise.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to say that this is the first time I ever heard of this circular.

Mr. LANE. I have known of it for, lo, these many years.

Mr. SMOOT. I, of course, am not going to question it until I make further examination into the matter, but I know that I was in such a position at that time that if any such circular had been sent to the banks in general I would have known it. I want to say to the Senator from Colorado that if a circular of that kind should come to a bank of which I was president, or of which I was a director, I should consider it an insult. There is no bank and no man in this country that has a right to demand of any banking institution what it shall do with its loans or its circulation. If the statement made by the Senator is correct, we can find out in about 10 minutes whether or not the circulation of the banks was withdrawn.

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, yes; I think if the Senator will consult the reports of the Comptroller of the Currency about the time a panic was inaugurated, he will find that it came about very largely through withdrawal of circulation and the calling in of loans.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Senator is mistaken as to the circulation question. Of course it is not my desire at this time to discuss the question as to what was the cause of the panic of 1893-94-95. I have listened with a great deal of pleasure to what the Senator has said.

Mr. THOMAS. I have yielded more time now than I had supposed would be consumed; but let me ask the Senator from Vermont a question, if the Senator from Utah is through.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; if the Senator desires to ask a question of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. THOMAS. I desire to ask the Senator if he has ever seen this circular in Vermont?

Mr. PAGE. I do not know that I ever have; and I think if any circular of that kind had come from a responsible source I should have remembered it.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator's recollection, then, is not clear on that subject?

Mr. PAGE. I was at that time, and am now, the president of a national bank.

Mr. THOMAS. I knew that, or the Senator would not have made an offer of $250 for this purpose.

Mr. PAGE. I wish to say to the Senator that I have great respect for the bankers of Vermont——

Mr. THOMAS. So have I.

Mr. PAGE. And I do not believe any one of them would have received such a circular without having made it public and denouncing it.

Mr. BURTON. Will the Senator from Colorado yield to me for a moment?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. BURTON. I was unfortunately absent when the statement was made which has evoked criticism. What do I understand is the statement of the Senator from Colorado—that a circular was issued advising the national banks to diminish their circulation?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BURTON. At what time?

Mr. THOMAS. In 1893, on the 12th day of March.

Mr. BURTON. 1893?

Mr. THOMAS. Eight days after Mr. Cleveland's inauguration.

Mr. BURTON. Does not the Senator from Colorado know that the circulation of national banks increased, rather than diminished, after that?

Mr. THOMAS. No; I am not aware of it. On the contrary, I do not think that is the case.

Mr. BURTON. The circulation of national banks reached its minimum in the year 1891. There was a very sharp decline in circulation from 1888 to 1891, due principally to a perfectly plain cause, namely, the very considerable amount of silver which was circulating as currency. That decrease continued to the year 1891, when it reached its minimum—that is, the circulation of national-bank notes. It increased in 1892 over 1891. It increased in 1893 over 1892, and again in 1894 over 1893. So it seems that the inference of the Senator from Colorado is incorrect.

Mr. THOMAS. Perhaps it is, Mr. President; but the historic fact is that in the early summer of 1893, 15 months before the Wilson bill became a law, this country was visited with the most tremendous panic in its history. Times were good, crops were abundant, industry was thriving. There was no occasion for it unless it was produced by artificial means. I have the right to call attention to these matters in answer to the assertion that the Wilson bill of 1894, which became a law in August of that year, carried in its train a fearful freight of miseries to the people of the United States and to its various industries.

Mr. Solomon, in the issue of the Forum to which I refer, said upon this subject—and I believe I stated that he was, or used to be, a member of the great banking house of Speyer & Co.:

It was well understood that a reform of the tariff was to be the nominal issue of the campaign in 1892, and that all the changes were to be rung upon that theme, but enthusiasm for a reform of the tariff would not have produced for the antisnapper movement the sinews of war

That reminds me of the "antisnapper movement," as it was called, which was the name given by the Cleveland Democrats to the early convention of Senator Hill, which was called for the purpose of electing Hill delegates to the Chicago convention of that year.

What it produced then was the conviction that the triumph of the Democratic Party, with Mr. Cleveland at its head, would mean a repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sherman Act. A large number of the men who joined actively in the work of organization, though also tariff reformers, could not have afforded to make the numerous self-sacrifices necessary to taking an active part in a canvass on any but such a vital issue as that of the maintenance of the integrity of the currency.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. THOMAS. If it will not take but a moment.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator object to my quoting from the Statistical Abstract of the United States?

Mr. THOMAS. It depends upon how long it takes.

Mr. SMOOT. Just a few minutes—not a few minutes; it will not take that. I just wanted to quote from the Abstract what the circulation was in 1892, 1893, 1894, and 1895.

Mr. THOMAS. Go ahead.

Mr. PAGE. Has the Senator the figures for 1891?

Mr. SMOOT. I have, if the Senator wishes them.

Mr. ROOT. Read them, too.

Mr. SMOOT. I will begin with 1891. The circulation in 1891——

Mr. THOMAS. What is the Senator giving? Is this the amount of national-bank notes?

Mr. SMOOT. National-bank notes in circulation.

Mr. THOMAS. What time in 1892?

Mr. SMOOT. It is for the year 1891 first. I will give the other years as I go along.

In 1891 the circulation was $162,220,646; in 1892 it was $167,271,517; in 1893 it was $174,609,786; in 1894 it was $200,718,200; in 1895 it was $206,903,601; and in 1896 it was $215,168,122.

Mr. THOMAS. The Wilson tariff bill seems to have had one good effect, anyhow, if it increased the national-bank circulation.

Mr. SMOOT. Rather than decreasing it, as the article says.

Mr. THOMAS. That may or may not be. The Senator has not read anything except the aggregate amount of note issues for each year. But to proceed. Mr. Solomon also says:

The nomination of Mr. Cleveland might be called a mere tempest in a teapot, compared with the battle to repeal the purchasing clause of the Sherman Act. This required the calling of an extra session of Congress in the summer, and after the people had had an object lesson in the threatened danger.

Of what did that object lesson consist, unless it was something of this sort? I do not think the political literature of the day will show any other than this particular object lesson, deliberately inaugurated for the purpose of securing the repeal of the purchasing clause of that statute.

He continues:

The severity of this object lesson in every part of the country is too well known to need much comment. Surely the men who have lived to see the financial crises of 1873, 1874, and 1890 were convinced that the crisis of 1893 surpassed all of the others combined in its duration and in the extent of its damage.

What did Senator Hill say in discussing the subject of the repeal on the floor of this Chamber on August 25, 1893? I read:

They (the bankers) inaugurated the policy of refusing loans to the people, even upon the best of security, and attempted in every way to spread disaster throughout the land. These disturbers—these promoters of the public peril—represent largely the creditor class, the men who desire to appreciate the gold dollar in order to subserve their own selfish interests; men who revel in hard times; men who drive harsh bargains with their fellow men regardless of financial distress; and men wholly unfamiliar with the principles of monetary science.

Mr. President, without reference to how much money was retired or whether any was retired, without reference to the calling in of loans or whether any loans were called in, the colossal fact is that some method was resorted to for the purpose of producing an object lesson the effect of which was to be the repeal of an obnoxious financial statute. If Senators who say or think this circular is mythical, who deride its existence, will give any other basis, any other object lesson than the one to which I have called attention, which was then administered to the people of a nation, I am perfectly willing to accept it to the extent to which it goes. But until that is done I maintain that the panic of 1893 was a manufactured panic—manufactured by the means I have asserted, manufactured for a deliberate purpose, which was finally accomplished without regard to the misery, the bankruptcy, and the ruin that followed for two or three years in its trail, a condition which I trust in God this country may never again encounter, but which can not, whatever may be said of it, be laid to the passage and subsequent operation of a Democratic tariff law, as it was called. We have the result; we have this assigned as the cause, and that is either the cause or some other than the tariff situation must be assigned for it.

One further reflection, Mr. President, and I am done. I do not think even the Senator from Michigan will contend that the panic of 1907 was due to any threat of tariff revision, or that it was due to any impending disturbance of existing industrial conditions. Every man is entitled to his own opinion concerning these matters.

My opinion is, Mr. President, that that, too, had for its object the suppression of what big business considered the incendiary utterances of the President of the United States against it, the acquisition of the Tennessee Coal & Iron Co. by the Steel Trust, the suppression of an irritating rival of the Standard Oil Co., or some of its constituent elements, to be followed by financial legislation that would go one step further and give to a great central reserve association, as it was called, but a great central national bank, as it would be, the absolute power to determine how much money the people of the United States should have and when and under what circumstances; to take from the Government of the United States its power of note issue and lodge it in the hands of this tremendous power which to-day is the real menace to the welfare, to the liberties, and the insfitutions of the people of the United States.

I deny that anywhere throughout the history of this country can any statement find justification which places upon an attempted reduction of taxation through legislation the responsibility for any financial or industrial disaster. I am satisfied, Mr. President, that the country will go through the present great reform and the country will adapt and adjust itself to the great changes that the Underwood bill is designed to carry out, with no disturbance except those which arise from an aroused apprehension that is being largely manufactured for the purpose of producing just such conditions, to the end that the hands of the Democratic Party may be stayed, its promises defeated, and its purposes paralyzed.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, when I was about to conclude my remarks yesterday I was asked a question by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]. I hope that Senator is in the Chamber, or, if not, that he may be sent for. I simply want to attempt to answer his question as to whether free sugar is incorporated in the Baltimore platform. In order to make my reply intelligent I must refer to his question, which appears in this morning's RECORD.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Louisiana that the Senator from Kentucky is very anxious to be here when he makes this statement; and it seems that he can not be found at this time.

Mr. RANSDELL. I will state to the Senator from Texas that I notified the Senator from Kentucky that I should take up this matter this afternoon, and asked him to be present. I wish him to be here, but I think in all fairness to myself I ought to make this explanation to-day. I wanted to make it yesterday, but I had no opportunity to do so. I hope the Senator will be sent for.

He said:

Mr. President, the Senator from Louisiana stated that the Democratic Party had done nothing which his people could construe as being in favor of free sugar, or had taken no action that would have advised his people in advance that if the Democratic Party obtained control we would place sugar upon the free list. Is it not true that the Democratic House of Representatives last year placed sugar upon the free list?

Mr. RANSDELL. It is.

Mr. JAMES. And is it not true that the Democratic national platform of 1912 specifically indorsed that action?

Mr. RANSDELL. No.

Mr. JAMES. Did it not do it in these words——

Mr. RANSDELL. Read the words.

Mr. JAMES. I have them here:

"At this time, when the Republican Party, after a generation of unlimited power in its control of the Federal Government, is rent into factions, it is opportune to point to the record of accomplishment of the Democratic House of Representatives in the Sixty-second Congress. We indorse its action, and we challenge comparison of its record with that of any Congress which has been controlled by our opponents."

"We indorse its action," says the Democratic platform. What was its action? Passing various tariff bills, chief among which was a free-sugar bill.

At that point, Mr. President, I was interrupted, and the unfinished business was taken up; so I had no opportunity to reply.

Now, Mr. President, the pertinent inquiry made is, Did the people of Louisiana think, after the Democratic platform of last year was adopted, that the party was pledged to free sugar and the consequent destruction of this great industry? I wish in a few words to explain what was their understanding. In the first place, we based our reliance upon this plank of the platform, the business plank, not the pyrotechnical one:

We recognize that our system of tariff taxation is intimately connected with the business of the country, and we favor the ultimate attainment of the principles we advocate by legislation that will not injure or destroy legitimate industry.

That plank, let me repeat, is the business plank of the platform. It is the one which was sounded upon by the campaign speakers, and especially by our standard bearer, Mr. Wilson, in making his speech of acceptance. Let me quote what he said rather briefly on the subject:

Tariff duties, as they—the Republicans—have employed them, have not been a means of setting up an equitable system of protection. They have been, on the contrary, a method of fostering special privilege. They have made it easy to establish monopoly in our domestic markets. Trusts have owed their origin and their secure power to them. The economic freedom of our people, our prosperity in trade, our untrammeled energy in manufacture depend upon their reconsideration from top to bottom in an entirely different spirit.

We do not ignore the fact that the business of a country like ours is exceedingly sensitive to changes in legislation of this kind. It has been built up, however ill-advisedly, upon tariff schedules written in the way I have indicated, and its foundations must not be too radically or too suddenly disturbed. When we act—

Please listen to these words, Mr. President and gentlemen of the Senate:

When we act we should act with caution and prudence, like men who know what they are about, and not like those in love with a theory. It is obvious that the changes we make should be made only at such a rate and in such a way as will least interfere with the normal and healthful course of commerce and manufacture.

Let me repeat those words:

It is obvious that the changes we make—

Make where? Make in the tariff schedules—should be made only at such a rate and in such a way as will least interfere with the normal and healthy course of commerce and manufacture.

And yet we are going to completely destroy the great sugar industry and put wool, too, on the free list, and other things besides. But to continue. Mr. Wilson said:

But we shall not on that account act with timidity, as if we did not know our own minds, for we are certain of our ground and of our object. There should be an immediate revision, and it should be downward, unhesitatingly and steadily downward.

Is there any pretense at free trade in that statement? Is there anything to indicate when our standard bearer was presenting his claims to the American people for the greatest office in the world that he was advocating free trade? I challenge anyone to single out the words in that letter of acceptance and get free trade out of them.

I go further. One of the principal tariff experts, if not the principal one, in the House of Representatives last session, other than Mr. UNDERWOOD himself, was the distinguished Representative from the State of New York who now occupies a position in the Cabinet of President Wilson. I find in the New York Times of August 1, 1912, this interview had with Mr. William C. Redfield at Sea Girt, N. J., on July 31 last. He says:

He (Gov. Wilson) is not for free trade. He is not for drastic action of any kind. He is willing to work through a series of years to accomplish the result of a tariff for revenue at which he aims. He is not disposed in any way to inflict changes that would upset and destroy business.

"A tariff for revenue"—

Gentlemen of the Senate.

"He is not disposed in any way to inflict changes that would upset and destroy business."

Let me say here you propose to upset and destroy the business of the Louisiana sugar industry and also the beet-sugar industry.

His views are clear and sound, and he has no rash or hasty ideas. I outlined the situation to Gov. Wilson in this way: I told him that a big manufacturer had all his capital tied up in his plant and that the tariff was a large figure in the cost of his goods. I said this manufacturer could not turn his stock over in a week or a month or even in a year, as a wholesaler could. If the tariff on his goods were 50 per cent where it ought to be only 20 per cent, then there would be an opportunity for the display of great wisdom. In outlining this case I did not urge clemency on the governor. I said the revision should be as full and complete as the case demanded, but that the revision should be done in gradual stages, not in sudden jumps. I suggested stages of, say, 5 per cent a year until the 20 per cent basis was reached. That would do justice and conserve business interests at the same time.

I compared the tariff problem to the case of a man who owed you $5,000. If the whole lump sum were demanded at once, you would probably put him out of business, but if you agreed to take $50 a month until the sum was paid, you could get your money in full and your debtor could save his business. I want to see the governor give every business a chance, and yet I believe that every schedule in the present tariff bill could be improved by downward revision.

Is there any suggestion of free trade for sugar, the greatest revenue producer in the whole tariff system—an article which has borne a rate of duty since the beginning of this Government, except for a brief period when it had a bounty—in this statement of Mr. Redfield, one of the leaders of the Democratic Party at that time, a man who made a great many speeches for his party, especially discussing the tariff, and who was honored by being given a place in the Cabinet? Does it sound in any degree like free trade? But I go further.

On the 18th of October, in the city of Pittsburgh, Mr. Wilson himself made this statement—at least he is so quoted in the Pittsburgh Dispatch of October 19 last. In discussing the party's attitude, Mr. Wilson said, and I ask every Senator to listen carefully to these words; the statement is very brief:

The Democratic Party does not propose free trade or anything approaching free trade. It proposes merely such reconsideration of the tariff schedules as will adjust them to the actual business conditions and interests of the country.

"The Democratic Party," said our standard bearer, now the President of the United States, "does not propose free trade or anything approaching free trade." Were not the people of Louisiana, Mr. President and Senators, justified by the plank of the platform from which I have read and from the statements of Mr. Wilson himself and Mr. Redfield, one of his mouthpieces, in believing that the party did not contemplate the destruction of this great and certainly this legitimate industry? If they were not justified in so believing from those plain words, plain English words, from a great master of English such as our President is, then I for one do not understand how you can make people understand anything.

Mr. President, when the Baltimore convention was held there was division among the delegates from Louisiana. It was said there, and was a matter of common report, that Mr. Wilson was friendly to sugar; that if Mr. Wilson became President sugar would not be destroyed, but that it would have to suffer a reasonable reduction, which all Democrats expected, and which, let me say in passing, I expect and am perfectly willing to submit to. But we did not then expect destruction. We did not then expect free trade. It was in the atmosphere then, and it was carried by the press reports and by our delegates to Louisiana, when they returned home, that our nominee would not stand for free trade in sugar and the destruction of Louisiana's greatest industry.

Those are some of the reasons, Mr. President and Senators, why the Louisianians did not expect from the Democratic Party the destruction of their industry.

In making my remarks yesterday my colleague in the House of Representatives [Mr. BROUSSARD], Senator elect to come into this body from Louisiana two years hence, was seated near me when the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] finished his question, and I was unable to reply because of the close of the morning hour. I asked Mr. BROUSSARD if he would not give me his explanation of the circumstances under which the plank referred to by the Senator from Kentucky was inserted in the platform. I did this because Mr. BROUSSARD was a member not only of the platform committee but of the subcommittee of 11 men appointed to write the platform.

To-day he handed to me this letter, which I will read. It is addressed to me:

UNITED STATES HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., May 14, 1913.

Hon. JOSEPH E. RANSDELL,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I was present in the Senate to-day when Senator JAMES, of Kentucky, quoted from the platform of our party, drafted at Baltimore, the following:

"At this time, when the Republican Party, after a generation of unlimited power in its control of the Federal Government, is rent into factions, it is opportune to point to the record of accomplishment of the Democratic House of Representatives in the Sixty-second Congress. We indorse its action and we challenge comparison of its record with that of any Congress which has been controlled by our opponents."

In conversation with you subsequent to this quotation of the Senator from Kentucky you reminded me that I was a member not only of the committee on platforms and resolutions but of the subcommittee of eleven which drafted the platform a quotation from which the Senator from Kentucky had read to you to-day in open Senate, and you asked me to give you my interpretation of that plank in the platform quoted by the Senator from Kentucky.

It is scarcely necessary to call your attention to the fact that if the Senator from Kentucky had read the entire plank of the platform instead of only the first paragraph of it the full meaning and purpose of that plank would have at once been made apparent. The committee on platforms and resolutions of the Democratic national convention at Baltimore did not stop where stopped the Senator from Kentucky in quoting the platform plank, but continued to enumerate the particular things which it thought were worthy of commendation by the Democratic national convention at Baltimore; so that if the Senator from Kentucky had read the balance of the plank instead of stopping with the first paragraph of it the Senate would have known at once that the committee on platforms and resolutions had enumerated the particular things about which it challenged comparison with the record of any other Congress controlled by the opponents of our party; hence that plank in the platform calls attention to the record of the Sixty-second Congress for its efficiency, economy, and constructive legislation as to the following subjects:

In revising the rules of the House of Representatives and thereby granting Members freedom of speech and action in advocating, proposing and perfecting remedial legislation;

In passing bills for the relief of the people and the development of our country;

In proposing amendments to the Constitution providing for the election of United States Senators by the direct vote of the people;

In securing the admission of Arizona and New Mexico as two sovereign States;

In requiring the publicity of campaign expenses both before and after the election and fixing a limit upon the election expenses of Senators and Representatives;

In passing bills to prevent the abuse of the writ of injunction;

In passing a law establishing an eight-hour day for workmen on all national public work;

In passing a resolution forcing the President to take immediate steps to abrogate the Russian treaty;

And, finally, in passing the great supply bills, which lessen waste and extravagance and which reduce the annual expenses of the Government by many millions of dollars.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. RANSDELL. I do.

Mr. STONE. I should like to ask the Senator from Louisiana if he objects to the speedy reference of this bill to the Committee on Finance?

Mr. RANSDELL. I do not.

Mr. STONE. Then I will ask him the further question, if he will not be willing to incorporate in the RECORD, without reading, as a part of his remarks the very long letter he is reading?

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I always like to do anything which the Senator from Missouri asks of me; but I must submit this is an unreasonable request. I am not going to read any long letter. This is not a long letter. It is about 11 pages in all, I believe. It is not from any outsider; it is from a Member of the House of Representatives, and a gentleman who will soon be a Member of this body, and I must decline not to finish the letter.

Mr. STONE. The only view I had in mind was because of my high regard for my friend from Louisiana. I am sure he has not, but unless he has a purpose to cooperate with my distinguished friend from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] and others in procrastinating the final determination of this simple motion to refer the bill that comes from the House to the Finance Committee, that that committee may go on and consider it, does he not think that we might forego the pleasure and all that sort of thing of prolonged discussion on this side?

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I am perfectly willing that the bill should be referred to the Finance Committee and that they should go to work on it. I would much prefer to have public hearings, and shall vote for them if I get an opportunity, because my people are demanding that of me. My people are being very badly treated. I do not know who is responsible. I know this, however, Mr. President, that the party platform did not declare for free sugar; I know the Senate last year did not vote for free sugar; I know that the President did not say free sugar once in all his speeches; I know that he made speeches in which he said that he was not for free trade; and yet now some influence seems to be inducing—I will not use a harsher word—the Democrats in the Congress of the United States to give us free sugar. I for one, propose to be heard fully, Mr. President, before free sugar shall ever be written into the statutes of the United States; and a good many more people are also going to be heard.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. RANSDELL. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I would not interrupt the Senator from Louisiana had it not been for the attempt of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] to give the impression that we are in collusion over the reference of the pending bill. I wish to disavow any such purpose. The Senator from Missouri has nothing to base his statement upon; but to say that I am not interested in what the Senator from Louisiana is saying now would, of course, be untrue. He says the President of the United States has never said he was for free trade in any public utterance since he became the candidate of the Democratic Party for President. The Underwood bill that you are about to refer to the Committee on Finance contains a free list that from its schedules and the volume of trade anticipated thereunder more than 55 per cent will come into the country under that bill free, and will not be stopped at the customhouse at all.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I trust the Senator from Louisiana will yield to me for a moment.

Mr. RANSDELL. I shall be delighted to do so.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I merely want to reply in an ineffective and weak way to the somewhat earnest remarks of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH].

The Senator from Michigan has just said that in every schedule in the Underwood bill we are presenting a propaganda of free trade to the country. So far as I am individually concerned I have never been afraid of the word "free." I have never been afraid of freedom of thought, of freedom of religion, or of freedom of trade. The Senator from Michigan, however, has made a statement which is not borne out by the cold facts. Not only is it not true that every schedule of the Underwood bill is for free trade, as he said——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I did not say that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But it is true that the average duties upon imports from foreign countries under that bill are more than 25 per cent, taking it up and down. It is also true that the Underwood bills, taken as a whole, present for the contemplation of the Senate a proposition of a reduction of about 35 per cent. I do not intend to be mathematically accurate, because it is impossible to be so.

Now, I want to say that an industry that can not exist with an advantage of 25 per cent over foreign competitors is an industry that confesses that it is unworthy to exist. I want also to say that when anybody says that 25 per cent or 30 per cent or 35 per cent is free trade he is confessing himself without the ability of an ordinary 14-year-old boy to make a mathematical calculation, for certainly hampering trade to the extent of 25 or 35 per cent is not free trade, whatever else may be said about it. There may be a discussion about its wisdom, its feasibility, or what not, but no human being can say that that is free, unhampered trade.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I shall have to decline to yield further. I wish merely to make a brief speech, and I can not consent to go into a general discussion of the tariff.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I was proceeding by the indulgence and courtesy of the Senator from Louisiana. I thank him very kindly for so much of it as I have already enjoyed and shall not trespass upon his time any further.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I will resume the reading of the letter sent me by Mr. BROUSSARD. He continues:

> Now, these were the specific things which the subcommittee of eleven of the committee on platforms and resolutions declared were the accomplishments of the Sixty-second Congress, and that declaration of the subcommittee found ample indorsement by the entire committee on platforms and resolutions, and, subsequently, of the convention itself acting with unanimity.
>
> Nowhere in that declaration can there be found any intimation that the "Underwood free-sugar bill" of the House met with the approval of the subcommittee of eleven, or of the committee on platforms and resolutions acting as a whole, or of the convention itself, as contended by the Senator from Kentucky.
>
> I shall have occasion a little later to refer to the specific declaration with regard to the tariff bills passed by the Sixty-second House of Representatives, among which the Senator from Kentucky reads in the "Underwood free-sugar bill of the House."
>
> This plank of the platform, from the aforementioned statement or from a careful study of the plank in its entirety, does not warrant the conclusion drawn by the Senator from Kentucky, as I understood his presentation of it to the Senate this afternoon in his question addressed to you.
>
> If the construction placed thereon by him be correct, what results? And let us view this question from conditions existing at the time the Democratic convention met at Baltimore.
>
> Five distinct and separate tariff bills, emanating from the Ways and Means Committee, had passed the House prior to the convening of the convention. Among these was a bill admitting foreign sugar into the United States free of duty, known as the "Underwood free-sugar bill." That bill had passed the House, together with the four other bills coming at the same time from the same committee of the House. The Senate Finance Committee, controlled at that time by the Republican Party, had given ample hearings on the "Underwood free-sugar bill," and after full and complete hearing not a single Senator—Democrat, Republican, or Progressive—on that committee approved of the action of the House in so far as the "Underwood free-sugar bill" was concerned. A contest over the bill subsequently occurred in the Senate, the Republicans and Progressives supporting what was then known as the Lodge-Bristow bill, reported by a majority of the Finance Committee of the Senate in place of the "Underwood free-sugar bill," which had passed the House.
> As far as the Democratic members of the Finance Committee were concerned, they discarded entirely the "Underwood free-sugar bill" and reported in lieu thereof an amendment, which was subsequently offered as a substitute for the Lodge-Bristow sugar bill, imposing a duty on sugar. In that contest upon the floor of the Senate between the Republicans and Progressives advocating the Lodge-Bristow bill and the Democrats advocating a duty on sugar as opposed to the "Underwood free-sugar bill," which had already passed the House, a vote was taken, and it occurred in the Senate as it had occurred on the vote taken in the Finance Committee that not one solitary Democratic Senator gave his adherence or his vote to the "Underwood free-sugar bill."

Senators, let me again read that pregnant sentence:

> "It occurred in the Senate, as it had occurred on the vote taken in the Finance Committee, that not one solitary Democratic Senator gave his adherence or his vote to the Underwood free-sugar bill."
>
> The Senate Democrats supported the Simmons amendment, which places a duty of 63 cents a hundred pounds on sugar of 75° of the polariscope and twenty-four one-thousandths cent additional for each additional degree.
> To summarize the action of the Senate on this measure, I will say that the Republicans and Progressives supported the Lodge-Bristow bill, which imposed certain duties upon sugar entering the United States, while the Democrats in that body supported the minority report of the Finance Committee, which imposed certain other duties upon sugar, and there was not one solitary, individual Senator belonging to our party that gave his influence or his vote in behalf of the Underwood free-sugar bill which had passed the House.
> When the convention met at Baltimore the disagreement between the House and Senate on the Underwood free-sugar bill was existent and the conferees of the House and Senate had been unable to reach an agreement thereon. The House insisted upon free sugar, while the Senate, with unanimity, insisted that some duty should be placed upon sugar. The difference between the attitude of the Democrats on one side and the Republicans and Progressives on the other was that the former wanted a slightly lower duty than the latter.
>
> I make this statement, known to yourself and Senators generally, as a prelude to what I am about to say.
>
> The subcommittee of eleven, selected by the committee on platforms and resolutions, included amongst its membership five distinguished Senators, namely, KERN, of Indiana, O'GORMAN, of New York, POMERENE, of Ohio, NEWLANDS, of Nevada, and MARTIN of Virginia. I was also a member of that subcommittee, the only Member of the House of Representatives who was such member. The six of us were a majority of the subcommittee of eleven. Now, all five of these distinguished Senators had stood with their colleagues in the Senate for a duty on sugar, as above recited, and against the attitude of the House of Representatives, which had passed the Underwood free-sugar bill. I myself had voted against that bill in the House, and it is easily understood that a majority of the subcommittee which drafted the platform were pledged, from a record which they had made in that, the Sixty-second, Congress in opposition to the Underwood free-sugar bill.
> If the construction placed on that platform by the Senator from Kentucky be correct, it is then apparent that in the drafting of the platform a majority of the subcommittee of eleven had voted to repudiate the position which they had but awhile ago occupied in that, the Sixty-second, Congress. Not only that, but the five Democratic Senators, members of the subcommittee, had also voted to put in the platform a condemnation not only of their attitude in opposition to the Underwood free-sugar bill, but a condemnation likewise of the action of their Democratic colleagues of the Finance Committee, and, finally, a condemnation of the attitude of all their Democratic colleagues in the Senate.
>
> I take it that no argument is needed to show the absurdity of the construction of that plank of the platform by the Senator from Kentucky, as evidenced by the question he directed to you.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. RANSDELL. Certainly.

Mr. REED. Because of the statement repeated in that letter, which amounts practically to an assertion that all Democratic Senators who now vote for free sugar stultify themselves, that statement being based upon the votes cast at the last session, I want to ask the Senator if he is not aware of the fact that the votes of the Democratic Senators upon that bill were a part really of the general program of compromise which was adopted when we were seeking as a minority party to pass the House schedule tariff bills in the best form we could, and therefore, having agreed upon a program, we voted for it, and that the vote did not at all represent the sentiments of each Senator? I think the Senator ought to concede that that is the fact, and not make it appear by his speech, which goes to the country, that the Democrats were committed to a tariff upon sugar because they voted at that time in that way.

Mr. RANSDELL. I do not concede that that is the fact, Mr. President, and I do not think the debates at that time will bear it out. If the Democratic Senators had at that time desired to go on record for free sugar, if they had desired to support the Underwood free-sugar bill, what was there to prevent them from doing so? They knew that they could not pass their compromise measure, if the Senator chooses so to designate it; they knew that the Republicans and Progressives had a majority of the Senate at that time; they knew that the two Louisiana Senators were going to vote in regard to sugar with the other side of the Chamber; they knew it was utterly impossible to pass any kind of a compromise of that character; and if they were frank and sincere in favor of free sugar it seems to me they should have voted in favor of free sugar, or at least should have explained their votes fully when voting for the Simmons amendment.

Mr. REED. If the Senator will pardon me, since the matter has taken this form, I should like the privilege of making this statement: The general policy, which was adopted upon this side with reference to tariff legislation at the session of Congress referred to, was to endeavor to agree upon a bill which would secure enough votes from the other side of the Chamber to pass it, and in the event that that was not possible to present a bill that would be as hard as possible for certain of the Members on the other side to reject, the thought, at least of some Senators, being that if they could not entirely remove an evil they desired to minimize it. Accordingly their votes were recorded time and again throughout that session for higher rates of tariff than would have been adopted by a caucus held upon this side of the Chamber alone. We were trying to do the best we could under the conditions. If we had assumed an heroic attitude and insisted upon having our own way absolutely and yielding nothing, we could not have passed a single bill. I think the author of that letter knows those facts perfectly, and that any attempt to commit the Democrats upon this side of the Chamber irrevocably by their votes of last session is unfair and unjust. It is not worthy of the author of the letter nor the distinguished Senator who is reading it. I want to make that statement now, and will be glad to make a further statement at the proper time.

Mr. STONE. Before the Senator proceeds, if he will permit me—I was called out of the Chamber for six or eight minutes and have just returned—I should like to ask if the letter the Senator is now reading is the same little billet doux of 11 pages that he spoke about?

Mr. RANSDELL. It is the same little billet doux. In reply to the kind criticism of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], I will say that the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] and myself are representatives now of a dying industry if the policy succeeds which certain people on this side of the Chamber are trying to carry out, and it is legitimate for us to fight just as hard as we can.

Can the Senator deny any of the facts stated in this letter? Can the Senator deny that every Senator on this side voted for a duty on sugar, as stated in this letter by Mr. BROUSSARD, the two Louisiana Senators voting for the higher rate of duty proposed in the Bristow-Lodge amendment and the rest of the Democratic Senators voting for the other rate of duty?

Mr. President, I know not what might have been the attitude of these Senators had the question of free trade been presented at that time. But the cold facts of the case are that when the Underwood free-sugar bill was before them they did vote, not for free sugar, but for a decided rate of duty upon sugar. When these five distinguished men, these Senators whom I have named, were acting on the subcommittee of the platform committee of their party in the city of Baltimore they knew the action which had been taken here. It is utterly unreasonable to suppose that those men would have criticized themselves by indorsing free sugar. They never contemplated anything of that kind in the plank.

I will now hear the Senator from Missouri, if he wishes.

Mr. REED. I simply say, as I said before, that I am not denying that this vote is recorded; but I am utterly denying and repudiating the implication that the Democratic Senators committed themselves to a tariff upon sugar because they voted for a rate which they hoped might pass the Senate under the circumstances then existing, and which would have been a decided reduction.

I wish to say now to the Senator that, so far as more than one Senator upon this side is concerned, I think they have under consideration whether or not this tariff ought to be all taken off at one time. But I say to the Senator, with great kindness, that it does not appeal to me very strongly to have my vote, and the vote of others who want to settle this question upon its merits, characterized in the way it is now being characterized.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I do not intend any unkind criticism or reflection upon the vote of the Senator from Missouri, or any other Senator in this body. I assure him that nothing is further from my thoughts. But when I am asked by the Senator from Kentucky whether or not my people in Louisiana did not have good cause to believe—that is, in substance, his question—that the Democratic Party was in favor of free sugar, and that we had nothing to expect from the Democratic Party, it surely is proper for me to state what actually occurred in the Senate of the United States, a coordinate branch of the lawmaking power, when a free-sugar measure was before Congress last year and was being considered. I could not tell what was in the minds of every one of these Senators. There was no way for me to know what they meant except by ascertaining what they did; and what they did was to vote for a considerable rate of duty on sugar. I may say, further, to the Senator from Missouri that the inference he has drawn that a majority of the Democrats of the Senate was opposed to a tariff on sugar is at variance with the actual facts, with which he should—to put it as kindly as possible—acquaint himself ere he attempts to speak.

Mr. President, I wish the Senator clearly to understand that I do not desire in the slightest way to reflect upon him or any other Senator. I am delighted to hear him say that a number of Senators on this side are very seriously contemplating some rate of duty on sugar. I earnestly hope that enough of them on this side will think that way to give us a fair rate of duty on sugar. Senators, let me beg of you not to destroy this great industry—this industry that has lasted so long and is so necessary to my State.

Continuing my reading of this letter—

I go a little further and say that if his [Mr. JAMES'S] construction of it be correct, how does he explain the fact that after the platform was adopted, after the national election, and after Mr. Wilson and Mr. Marshall had been elected President and Vice President, respectively, there was a session of Congress, during which was pending the controversy between the House, standing for the Underwood free-sugar bill, and the Senate, standing by sugar as a legitimate subject for tariff taxation, no Democratic Senator was heard during that entire session of Congress to urge that the Democrats had erred in not supporting the Underwood bill, and that the Democratic Senators at least proposed to recede from the position which all of the Democratic Senators had occupied prior to the convention? Why did not some Democratic Senator urge the Democratic conferees of the Senate, in obedience to that platform, to recede from their position in favor of a duty on sugar and to accede to the demands of the Members of the House of Representatives, whose action the Senator from Kentucky states was approved by the Baltimore convention, that sugar be put on the free list?

Just as the Senator from Kentucky, stopping as he did in his question to you, omitted to specifically recite the things the Democratic convention at Baltimore approved as the accomplishments of the Democratic House of Representatives in the Sixty-second Congress, so does the Senator from Kentucky overlook the specific things enumerated in the platform which make absolutely clear the declaration of the Baltimore convention with regard to the bills revising the tariff. I recited a while ago that the resolutions committee enumerated the specific things for which it commended the Democratic House of Representatives of the Sixty-second Congress.

Let us revert now to the first proposition in the platform, that about the tariff, of which you were speaking at the time the Senator from Kentucky read the plank to which I have just referred.

We find that at the very outset of the declaration of the principles of our party there is a denunciation of President Taft for "vetoing the bills to reduce the tariff of the cotton, woolen, metal, and chemical schedules, and the farmers' free list, all of which were designed to give immediate relief to the masses from exactions of the trusts."

These were the specific things with regard to tariff revision that the platform approved, and for which they denounced the President as having used the veto power to prevent these bills, specifically mentioned, from becoming law, and in the plank referred to by the Senator from Kentucky it will be noticed that there is no mention of the "Underwood free-sugar bill." That bill at the time was in suspense between the two Houses, and the convention did not presume to indorse the Democrats in the House who favored free sugar, nor did it condemn the Democrats in the Senate, every one of whom was opposed to free sugar.

But the plank which the Senator from Kentucky may have properly called to your attention as applicable "on all fours" to the Democratic attitude with regard to sugar reads:

"We recognize that our system of tariff taxation is intimately connected with the business of the country, and we favor the ultimate attainment of the principles we advocate by legislation that will not injure or destroy any legitimate industry."

Now, this provision declared it to be the purpose of the Democratic Party, in revising the tariff downward, to neither injure nor destroy any legitimate industry. Mr. UNDERWOOD, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, with great frankness, said repeatedly on the floor of the House that the provision in his bill regarding the duty on sugar would destroy the Louisiana sugar industry. Mr. HARDWICK, of Georgia, unquestionably the best posted of the Members advocating free sugar, likewise admitted that the Louisiana sugar industry would be destroyed as a result of this legislation.

The history of that plank in the platform, interesting as it is, need not be recited here, because it is apparent to the logical mind that that plank, and that plank only, applies to the subject which you were discussing when interrupted by the question of the Senator from Kentucky.

I suggest that if further inquiry is to be made about this, along the lines suggested by the Senator from Kentucky, there are many Senators who can explain this platform as intended for the people to understand.

Apart from the Senators whom I have already mentioned, a new Democratic Senator has come from Montana, Mr. WALSH, who himself was a member of the subcommittee of eleven. Two Senators, Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas and Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas, were members of the general committee on platforms and resolutions. Another distinguished then Senator elect, who now occupies a seat in this body, Mr. VARDAMAN, was also a member of the general committee. There are doubtless other Senators and members of the present cabinet who may enlighten the Senator from Kentucky in his desire to ascertain just what the Democratic platform did intend and did say upon this question.

One salient point remains, and that is that the Senator from Kentucky was himself the permanent chairman of the Democratic convention at Baltimore. I listened attentively to his address—and he is always interesting when speaking—and I recall distinctly his plea for free sugar. That plea met with no response from either the subcommittee of eleven which drafted the platform, or the entire committee, which reported it to the convention, or the convention itself.

I recall that while the subcommittee was engaged in drafting the platform, and after the distinguished Senator from Kentucky had made his ardent appeal for free sugar, the Sugar Trust, acting through the instrumentality of Frank C. Lowry, an employee of Mr. Spreckels, of the Federal Refining Co., was bombarding not only the subcommittee but the entire committee on platforms with telegrams, urging the convention to include in the platform a plank for free sugar.

Senators, what a spectacle! The Senator from Kentucky—he was not then a Senator, but a great Member of Congress—being backed up in his efforts for free sugar by Frank C. Lowry, the agent and representative of the Sugar Trust!

It must appear to you and, in fact, to every fair-minded man that, with the chairman of the convention, the Senator from Kentucky, pleading to the body over which he presided for free sugar, and with the Sugar Trust, by telegrams, imploring the convention to declare for free sugar, it was not an oversight on the part of either the subcommittee of eleven or the full committee on platforms and resolutions or the convention that it was not written in the platform, as the Senator from Kentucky now attempts to read it in, that the Democratic Party stood or stands for free sugar, but, on the contrary, this action was the deliberate conclusion that the Democratic Party stood against the "Underwood free-sugar bill" and in favor of a duty on sugar.

Kindly pardon me for writing to you at such length. I have studiously abstained from saying anything regarding the deliberations leading to the writing and adoption of the platform. I have assumed to discuss this platform absolutely from the analytical standpoint of one who seeks the truth, just as the Senator from Kentucky has sought, despite his knowledge of all of the facts, to find in the platform words which never were written in it, were never intended to be written in it, and which a full analysis of the platform does not warrant to be construed as having been written into it.

Yours, very sincerely, R. F. BROUSSARD.

Mr WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. RANSDELL. Just a moment, and then I will yield.

It is unnecessary for me to tell the Senate who Mr. BROUSSARD is. He has been a Member of the House of Representatives for a great many years. He lives in the very heart of the sugar belt. He has been a close student of sugar and a great champion of it during his entire career in Congress. He was a member of the subcommittee of eleven, along with the five Senators I have referred to who assisted in framing the Baltimore platform. Does any reasonable man pretend to intimate that this man, with his record of faithful service to sugar, championing the cause of sugar for 18 years, would have forgotten himself so far as to agree to a plank actually condemning the interest that he had stood for during his entire congressional career? Such a supposition is preposterous.

I now yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Louisiana this plain question: I want him, if he can, to explain to this side of the House, to the Senate, and to the country why it is that the Louisiana Senators now, as in past time, have resisted just as obstinately any reduction of the duty on sugar as they resist free sugar. I want the Senator to explain, if he can, why it was that the two Louisiana Senators in the last Congress voted upon this floor against a reduction of 33⅓ per cent in the sugar duty, on which reduction every Louisiana planter now admits that he could live, and why it is that they are now fighting the reduction of 50 per cent, the only alternative, against free sugar just as obstinately as they fight free sugar itself. It seems to me that they are imitating somewhat the ancient régime, the old noblesse of France, who failed to make concessions until they stirred up a feeling which destroyed them.

I am perfectly willing to admit that free sugar will dismantle every sugar house in the State of Louisiana. I know it as well as I know my name is JOHN WILLIAMS. Mr. UNDERWOOD has admitted the same thing. When we faced the proposition of reducing the duty in the last Congress in the Senate of 33⅓ per cent only it would not have destroyed them. It would have left them with a reasonable profit. They fought that just as vigorously as they are now fighting free sugar. They deprived the men who wanted a square deal, who do not want to single sugar out as the only industry to be destroyed, of all opportunity to help them. I should like to have some explanation of that.

I will add to it this: If the Senate, instead of putting sugar on the free list at the end of three years would vote for a proposition to cut the duty on sugar half in two, leaving it, generally speaking, at three-quarters of a cent, 96 polariscopic test, varied above and below it by the differential, would the Senator if that proposition were presented to him accept it as against the present bill?

Mr. RANSDELL. May I understand the last proposition, please? Do I understand the Senator to ask whether or not if at the end of three years, instead of having a free-sugar clause take effect——

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; I said if instead of the present proposition, which is a substantial reduction of 25 per cent ad valorem for three years, and after three years free sugar, you were to be presented with a proposition to put a duty upon sugar of substantially three-quarters of a cent, three-quarters of a cent at 96 polariscopic test, varying from it on both sides accordingly, would you prefer it?

Mr. RANSDELL. To take effect at once?

Mr. WILLIAMS. To take effect at once, and to continue without the three years' clause. Which one of the two would you accept?

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, it will take me but a minute to answer that. So far as we are concerned and so far as my knowledge of sugar is concerned, coming, as I said yesterday, from a cotton section of the State, I would unhesitatingly prefer a duty of 1 cent for three years, because we die then at the end of three years certainly. If we had a cut in the rate of 50 per cent it would give us something like three-quarters of 1 cent indefinitely, and with that rate I do not believe it possible for the industry to live. Yet I feel that some few people might struggle along for a while. I think the future quick death would be better. They would know beyond question that they had to die at the end of three years, and it would be kinder to them to make it three years than to give then a 50 per cent cut now.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. RANSDELL. If the Senator from Mississippi will allow me a further statement: If a proposal were made to make the duty 1 cent for three years, after which there would be a reduction to 50 per cent of the present rate, I say now in my position as Senator, that I would advise my people to accept it. They would thereby be given time to change their methods and to install a refining process, which I am told has been about perfected.

But I further say that having pledged myself in the most solemn manner on at least 50 platforms when I was a candidate for the United States Senate that I would stand by the interest of sugar in a legitimate way and do everything in my power to prevent the industry from being destroyed by what I considered unfair legislation, I would have to oppose even that unless my people were willing to accept it; but I believe I could induce them to accept that at the end of three years.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not want to talk about any specialty. This situation presents itself to me as pathetic. The United States Government has invited and even incited, encouraged, and almost driven a whole lot of people into raising sugar cane and sugar beets, two artificial industries which, upon their own legs, could never have existed in this country to-day. The industry as far as cane sugar is concerned is impossible, and as far as beet sugar is concerned is premature now, because the country was not ready for it when the country was thrown into the beet-sugar production. I believe that a duty of three-quarters of a cent will enable the beet-sugar industry of this country to exist and to make a reasonable profit in all factories which are conducted with up-to-date machinery, with efficient labor and conducted in the way in which a factory ought to be conducted. I believe that it will enable—the 50 per cent reduction will enable—the sugar-beet farmer to exist at a price that will render him more profit upon his farm per acre than the cotton planter of the South receives per acre in absolute free competition with the fellaheen of Egypt at 17 cents a day and with the Hindus of India at 8 or 10 cents a day.

So I am not talking about the protectionist phase of it. I am talking merely about the condition which now confronts us. I am not willing to do an unfair or an unjust thing, whether in keeping with my theory or in violation of it. It is pathetic to me to think that these people have been invited to come in and walk in deep water on stilts, and that when they are now asked to walk without stilts they must be drowned.

I am a neighbor to Louisiana. I have friends there. I love the State and I love its people. I have volunteered to make more sacrifices than any man on this floor, not only of opinion but of sacrifice of support at home to help them out. They will not help themselves out. The Senator has just confessed that he would just as obstinately refuse to vote for any reduction at all as to vote for free sugar.

Mr. RANSDELL. Let me interrupt the Senator. I did not say that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will pardon me, I did not mean to say that I was quoting the Senator exactly. I was merely quoting my inference from what he said.

Mr. RANSDELL. Then I wish to explain, if the Senator will let me explain, right at this time. I did not say that I would not consent to any reduction in sugar. On the contrary, I believe that as a Democrat I am absolutely committed by my party to consent to a reduction in sugar, and though I believe a cut of 25 per cent will drive out of the business a great many of the sugar producers of Louisiana, I for one consent to that cut and will vote for a 25 per cent reduction in sugar, which I understand is the cut in the Underwood bill. The trouble is that at the end of three years we are to have free sugar. That was my statement.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, of course any Member of this body knows that a reduction of 25 per cent will not bring about a really competitive market in sugar; that the gentleman in yielding that yields nothing.

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield to the Senator for a question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What I have to say will not take long.

Mr. President, of course, if a duty upon any important article were 1,000 per cent and it were proposed to reduce it to 995 per cent, it would drive out of the industry some people who had been living upon the ragged edge of the industry barely making a living, barely making a profit sufficient to justify them to remain in that particular business. So far as that point of the observation of the Senator from Louisiana goes, that is the answer.

I do not deny that a reduction of the rate upon sugar will drive some beet-sugar factories out of business, but they are a sort of beet-sugar factories that ought to be driven out of business, because they either have unwise overhead management, unwise men upon the quarterdeck, or they have inefficient men behind the guns, or they are unfortunately located geographically and with regard to the annual giving out of rain and sunshine, or they are making undue profits.

But, Mr. President, the complete answer to the Senator from Louisiana, as far as Louisiana sugar cane is concerned—the complete confirmation of what I have just said—is contained in this one statement, which nobody will dispute, that at the last session of Congress, when this particular question came up, when a free-sugar bill came from the House—and the President will pardon me for saying that I was at that time a member of the Finance Committee—I felt friendly toward these people, and I also felt the pathos of their situation; I knew that every sugar house in Louisiana would be dismantled if free sugar were put upon the statute books; as I now know, as I have told both the Democratic leader of the House of Representatives and the President of the United States, I proceeded as a member of that committee to try to find a living for them out of the industry in accord with the Democratic platform, which was to reduce duties gradually and not to destroy absolutely any legitimate industry; and the only Members upon this side of the Chamber who, as I found, would not help me were the two Senators at that time from the State of Louisiana. Now, how can you help people who will not help themselves?

Mr. RANSDELL. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. RANSDELL. You say that at that time you urged a reduction. I believe it was about one-third—33⅓ per cent.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It was 33⅓ per cent.

Mr. RANSDELL. Is it not a fact that the average reduction in the Underwood bill is about 35 per cent?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; I was willing to give you less reduction than I voted to give the other people.

Mr. RANSDELL. It was a year ago that I am speaking about. The average reduction of the Underwood bill, I think, is about 35 per cent.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have not calculated it, but it is about the same.

Mr. RANSDELL. Let me ask you why it is you propose to have sugar reduced to 50 per cent when the average reduction is 35 per cent? Why treat sugar worse than the average?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will state that, too. The average reduction in the Underwood bill is about 35 per cent—without calculating it mathematically; I have not done that—just from a general view of the whole situation I think it was about what it was last year—some things higher and some a bit lower. That was the reduction clear through. The flax and hemp schedule, let me say, is a reduction of 50 per cent. The reduction on wool is 100 per cent; and even if we take the vote of the House at the last Congress it is 50 per cent, as I remember it now. I may be inaccurate, because I have not a great head for figures unless I have them before me.

Now, I have proposed at this session to make a reduction upon sugar of 50 per cent because I thought that was the wisest reduction. I thought 33⅓ per cent reduction wiser, but I thought that 50 per cent reduction was now the only thing that could possibly be gotten through the Finance Committee or possibly be gotten through this body. I had the honor to state to the Senator from Louisiana, personally, as well as to ex-Senator Foster, to his colleague [Mr. THORNTON], and to his colleague elect, Mr. BROUSSARD, my idea that that was the utmost that could possibly be hoped for by them, and that they had to take their choice between a three years' reduction of 25 per cent and free trade afterwards or a reduction now of 50 per cent.

When I went to the sugar-beet men and talked about it to them they told me that they could defend a reduction, although they could not defend free sugar. I do not mean that they said they would not defend it, but I mean that they said they could not, consistently, with their past utterances in their several States. I am talking now with the utmost frankness. But when I went to men who represented the Louisiana people, the Senators, Congressmen, and sugar planters—and amongst the latter are some of the very dearest friends I have in the world; I would myself rather cut off my left hand under safe auspices in a hospital, with good surgical attention, than to hurt them—they returned me the uniform answer that the Senator from Louisiana did a moment ago—that they would rather die suddenly at the end of three years than to die gradually with a 50 per cent reduction.

Mr. President, I do not believe that a 50 per cent reduction does mean death to the Louisiana cane-sugar industry. I may be mistaken; but I have looked into the matter to the best of my poor ability, and I know, as well as I know that my name is JOHN WILLIAMS, that it does not mean death to the beet-sugar industry, except to those inefficient factories on the ragged edges and amongst the people who are not up to date in their overhead management, in their efficiency of labor, and in their wisdom and economy of management.

Mr. RANSDELL. I hope the Senator from Mississippi will allow me to finish.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Wait a moment.

Mr. RANSDELL. Was the Senator about through? I merely want to finish.

Mr. WILLIAMS. My dear sir, I thought you had given up the floor long ago.

Mr. RANSDELL. Not at all. I have been waiting patiently to conclude.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, then, I will finish in one more moment. I shall then be through.

I am going to offer my proposition in the subcommittee. If not carried there, I am going to carry it to the Finance Committee; if not carried there, I may or may not carry it to the caucus—I have not made up my mind about that—but if the caucus and the school of political thought to which I belong shall decide otherwise, I shall regret exceedingly that my very dear friends from Louisiana have not helped me to help them; but I shall quit with that, and I shall base my justification for quitting—for I am not a quitter as a rule—upon the speech just made by the Senator from Louisiana, in which he has laid down his ultimatum—the ultimatum of a special industry, the ultimatum of a special privilege; in fact, a declaration of war. After all, the sugar duty is a special privilege, because no man has a God-given or a natural right to make money out of an industry of any sort except where he can stand upon his two legs without legislative help. I have never stood much for special privilege. I have somewhat stood for it in this particular case and have done my best; but I shall justify myself for quitting upon the ground that the Senator from Louisiana said that he would rather die suddenly at the end of three years than to be "tortured to death" all the rest of his life with three-fourths of a cent a pound on sugar.

What is three-fourths of a cent a pound on sugar? It is about one-fourth of the price of sugar—about 25 per cent. What right, speaking now as a theoretical Democrat, no longer as a practical Democrat, no longer as a working Democrat, no longer as a man facing a political situation and condition, but speaking from the standpoint of economic theory—what right has any man to come to a whole people and say, "I can not make a living without an advantage of 25 per cent over the balance of the world, and therefore I demand that 25 per cent advantage"?

There sits before me the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], who made several campaigns in the West in the bravest possible manner for the Democratic Party, and he was faced by his opponent in one of those campaigns, who said "If the Democrats came into power they would put sugar upon the free list." The Senator denied it; and he had every right to deny it; yet we are going to crucify him upon this altar. I hate to do it; I do not want to do it. I am willing to make a greater reduction on sugar than is made upon the average schedule. I am willing to make a reduction of 50 per cent, while the average reduction is 35 per cent.

Mr. RANSDELL. I do not want to interrupt the Senator; but I think I have been very patient. He rose to ask a question, and I have allowed him to do so.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have heard that before; but I imagined, unless I was very much mistaken, that the Senator from Louisiana had finished his remarks and had taken his seat before I took the floor.

Mr. RANSDELL. Not at all. The Senator is entirely mistaken. I was on the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am informed by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] that I am mistaken; and I therefore withdraw what I have said.

Mr. RANSDELL. I am glad to hear the Senator say so. I want to thank the Senator very much for his kindly interest in Louisiana. I do not know a State, outside of his own, in which he has warmer friends or greater admirers or more of them than in Louisiana, and I know that we are going to continue to love and honor him down there, no matter what action he may finally take in regard to this measure, which is of such vast importance to us. He has been our true and tried friend in the past, and we believe he is going to continue to be our friend. I will not attempt at this late hour, when there are others to speak, to go into a general discussion of the sugar tariff. The Senator from Mississippi admits that free sugar would kill us and dismantle every sugar factory in the State. The people who are in the business—I am not, but those who are in the business—tell me they would be destroyed just as effectually by a reduction of 50 per cent as they would be by free trade. That is the reason why I am opposed to that reduction. They have told me that the very limit that they could stand, and a limit that many of them could not stand, is a reduction of 25 per cent, or a duty in round numbers on the Cuban raw sugar of 1 cent a pound. I have gone just as far as I can in that respect with the present lights before me.

Mr. President, I have no disposition to hold the Senate any longer. I merely wish to add that I hope the milk of human kindness, with which the heart of the Senator from Mississippi is always overflowing, is going to continue to flow in his mind as chairman of the subcommittee in charge of this sugar question, and that he will succeed in reaching some conclusion which will prevent the great industry of my State from being destroyed.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I know Senators are anxious that this day's session, which has already been very much prolonged, shall be ended, and I wish to ask the Senators on the other side if they will not consent to fix an hour to-morrow, say, at 3 o'clock, to vote upon the pending motion and amendments to it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate agree to take a recess at this time until 11 o'clock to-morrow, and that the vote be taken at or before 3 o'clock to-morrow afternoon.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. I will accept the suggestion of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] that a vote be taken at or before 3 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. JAMES. Just a moment. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] has occupied about an hour and a half, together with the assistance of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], in which time he has undertaken to answer the question I asked him yesterday. In the course of his remarks he has made an attack upon my record in regard to sugar in the national convention, and I certainly desire an opportunity to answer his speech.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will modify my request in this way, that at the conclusion of the speech of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] to-night the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning, and that a vote be taken upon this question at or before 3 o'clock p. m. to-morrow.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask for a further modification of the request. I am satisfied that it would suit the convenience of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] better that the Senate should meet to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock, that the Senator from Kentucky should be recognized at that time, immediately after the reading of the Journal, and that, after the morning hour, a vote be taken upon the pending motion.

Mr. SMOOT. We could hardly dispose of the matter by that time.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will ask the Senator from Utah if he will not modify his suggestion and provide that the vote shall be taken to-morrow at 1 o'clock? The Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] does not wish, and I do not wish, the consideration of the pending matter to displace his resolution, unless it is absolutely necessary.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if the request is granted it will not displace the resolution of the Senator from Indiana at all. At the conclusion of the morning hour all the Senator need do is to ask to lay the resolution aside temporarily. Then I will assure the Senator from Indiana that, immediately upon the conclusion of the vote upon the pending matter, I personally will vote to take up the resolution, if there is any question as to the Senate taking it up to-morrow.

Mr. KERN. It might just as well be included in the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly willing to include it, so as to provide that to-morrow, immediately after the vote is taken upon the question of the reference of the tariff bill to the Finance Committee, the resolution of the Senator from Indiana shall be considered.

Mr. KERN. It will still be the unfinished business.

Mr. SMOOT. It will still be the unfinished business, of course.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, it seems to me that somewhere in this agreement there ought to be some provision for debate upon the side of the House that desires to discuss the question before the Senate at this time, to wit, the question of open hearings. The Democratic side of the Senate to-day have discussed for three or four hours, not at all that question, but the question as to the merits of the proposed tariff bill, and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] has given an intimation that he desires to reply at length to the statements that have already been made on the other side. It occurs to me that there ought at least to be included in the proposed agreement the proposition that 20 or 30 minutes before the vote is taken shall be allowed Senators on this side of the Chamber who desire to discuss the merits of open hearings.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is fair. I suggest that that be incorporated.

Mr. SMOOT. I hardly think that will be necessary.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield to me to make a motion?

Mr. RANSDELL. Certainly.

Mr. STONE. I do not know what answer the Senator from Kentucky may make to the observations of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL]; we would all be delighted to hear him, of course; but however able or eloquent his address may be it is not really, with all due deference to him, so important as it is to get on with this business, and since the Senator from Louisiana yields to me I move to lay the amendment offered——

Mr. SMOOT. I hope the Senator will not do that at this time.

Mr. STONE. I move to lay the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] as modified on the suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] on the table, so that we may have an immediate expression upon the question as to whether we will have public hearings.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays are demanded. Is the demand seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not understand the motion of the Senator from Missouri.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri moves to lay on the table the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] as modified on the suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] to the motion of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] to refer the bill to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I wish to say——

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask the Senator from Missouri to withdraw that motion, and that we may have the regular order.

Mr. LODGE. The regular order is the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. STONE. If the chairman of the Committee on Finance, of which I am a member, asks me to withdraw the motion, I will do so; but I desire to bring this matter to a head.

Mr. NORRIS. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

Mr. STONE. I withdraw the motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. NORRIS. By unanimous consent, has not the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] already been adopted and become a part of the motion? I understand that has been done by unanimous consent.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no.

Mr. NORRIS. If so, it can not be in order to lay on the table an amendment that has already been agreed to and is a part of the original motion.

Mr. SMOOT. It has not been agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; it has not been agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has not been agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask——

Mr. JAMES. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask the Senators on the other side if they are at this time willing to agree to give unanimous consent to vote upon this motion and any amendments thereto at 3 o'clock to-morrow evening?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, that is the very request that I originally made.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now I ask unanimous consent that to-morrow afternoon at 3 o'clock a vote be taken upon the pending motion and all amendments thereto.

Mr. SMOOT. But when are we to take it up?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is a motion now pending before the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. It can be taken up when the Senate meets to-morrow. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-night, it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning, and I ask unanimous consent that at 3 o'clock to-morrow afternoon there be a vote upon the motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Finance and all amendments thereto.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I ask if the Senator will agree to a division of time?

Mr. SIMMONS. We will give you ample time. We will give you half the time.

Mr. JAMES. I desire to ask the Senator from North Carolina, if the Senate meets at 11 o'clock, whether his request, if granted, will give me an opportunity to reply to the extended argument made by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL]?

Mr. SIMMONS. I will say to the Senator that immediately upon the convening of the Senate to-morrow I will ask that this matter be laid before the Senate.

Mr. JAMES. And that I be recognized?

Mr. SIMMONS. I think there will be ample time for the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. There will be four hours, of course, and I feel that the Senator from Kentucky is entitled to answer the remarks of the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. SIMMONS. And the Senator from Kentucky will have ample time in which to do so.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I have just entered the Chamber, and I should like to make an inquiry as to the status of pairs. Are pairs to be entertained to-morrow on this question?

Mr. SIMMONS. I presume the same rule that always obtains as to pairs will apply to-morrow.

Mr. PENROSE. I have heard some report about pairs having been canceled.

Mr. SIMMONS. Nothing of that kind has been done.

Mr. KERN. There is nothing of that kind proposed at this time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Pairs would not be withdrawn except after giving fair notice to the other side.

Mr. PENROSE. I understood such a notice had been given.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There was some talk on this side of having a caucus for the purpose of canceling all pairs——

Mr. SIMMONS. Of course pairs will be recognized.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Coupled with the idea of giving four or five days' notice, or whatever is reasonable, to the other side. Of course we are not going to cancel pairs without notice.

Mr. PENROSE. I can not be here to-morrow, and of course I wanted a pair on the motion.

Mr. KERN. I understand that the original arrangement as to the pending unfinished business was included in the agreement.

Mr. SMOOT. That is, that immediately after the conclusion of the vote on the pending motion to-morrow the Senator may move to take up his resolution.

Mr. KERN. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair desires to understand what the proposed unanimous-consent agreement is. Is it to the effect that when the Senate adjourns to-day it shall adjourn until 11 o'clock to-morrow, and that immediately upon reconvening it shall proceed with the discussion of the motion, and that a vote be taken at 3 o'clock?

Mr. SMOOT. Not later than 3 o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. And then, after the conclusion of the vote, that the regular order, the unfinished business, shall be taken up?

Mr. SMOOT. That the unfinished business shall then be taken up for consideration.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to inquire if there is any understanding on the part of the Senator from North Carolina and other Senators as to how the time is going to be parceled out?

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to say to the Senator that I do not know of any Senator on this side, with the exception of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], who desires to speak to-morrow.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to say to the Senator that I have some remarks to make. I have not undertaken to get recognition, because I knew that my remarks would perhaps not be directly on the point, and I wanted to give every Senator an opportunity to discuss, if he desired so to do, the real question before the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will say to the Senator that I am satisfied that the other side will be given ample time to-morrow.

Mr. SMOOT. We have not had any time whatever yet.

Mr. STONE. You have had all the time, practically.

Mr. NORRIS. The unanimous-consent agreement, as I understand, Mr. President, contemplates that the Senate shall meet to-morrow at 11 o'clock?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It does.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; it provides that the Senate shall meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Kentucky about how long he expects to speak to-morrow.

Mr. JAMES. I will occupy nothing like the time consumed by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL]. I should say that I shall not take over 40 minutes, if that much time.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to say to the Senator from North Carolina that I have no desire to prolong this discussion or to prevent a vote from being taken; and I would not like to be the means of preventing any other Senator speaking on the question, if he so desires. At the same time, I should not like to have a unanimous-consent agreement made with a limitation of debate that would necessarily cut me out.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think I can say to the Senator that, so far as this side of the Chamber is concerned, there will be nothing to interfere with his having all the time he may desire to-morrow.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, just a word.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Chair understand that there is a unanimous-consent agreement or that there is not?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. There is not yet, Mr. President.

I am very anxious that a unanimous-consent agreement shall be reached if possible. I have an amendment pending here. The debate has not proceeded upon the amendment at all at this time. It has proceeded upon the tariff bill. I have no assurance that the entire time will not be taken up in that way. I want an opportunity to speak, for a few minutes at least, possibly half an hour, upon that amendment. I have delayed asking for the floor up to the present time, because I wanted to speak upon the pending question somewhere near the time when it was going to be voted upon.

I desire to make the suggestion that at 3 o'clock to-morrow 10-minute speeches may be made upon amendments. Then, if I found myself unable to get any time before 3 o'clock, I could withdraw my amendment, and offer it then, and speak at least 10 minutes under that arrangement.

Mr. SIMMONS. And that a vote be taken not later than 4 o'clock to-morrow?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly; and that then the unfinished business shall come up.

Mr. SIMMONS. I modify the request in that way.

Mr. STONE. What is the request?

Mr. SIMMONS. That when the Senate adjourns to-night it adjourn until to-morrow at 11 o'clock——

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to inquire of the Senator from North Carolina about the partition of the remainder of the time. If it is occupied by my friends of the opposite persuasion as liberally as it has been this afternoon, I do not know where any of the rest of us are likely to get any time.

Mr. SIMMONS. I can not say anything to the Senator with reference to that; but I am advised that there is no one upon this side who desires to speak except the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES].

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I desire to say to the Senator from North Carolina that I shall ask for an opportunity to address the Senate for about three minutes upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to say further, Mr. President, in continuation of my inquiry, that a great many of us have listened with considerable appreciation to the discussion. It has ranged over the entire field of this controversy. Such time as several of us desire to consume will be used in speaking directly to the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania. That deals with the propriety or impropriety of granting hearings before the Finance Committee. That would only involve, from such considerations as I wish to present, any change in conditions that has occurred since the last hearings before the Finance Committee and since attempted legislation was had to the present time. Really the pertinent inquiry, Mr. President, is whether any changes have occurred in that period which would make it proper to consume time before the committee in the hearings contemplated by the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania. I should like to have assurances, before unanimous consent is given, if I can properly exact them, that there will be adequate time for a very brief presentation of those changes in the conditions as we see them.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think I can assure the Senator that there will be ample time for that purpose.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, does the Senator mean that the Finance Committee intends to give hearings before the full committee?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I was not talking about that.

Mr. PENROSE. I understood that was the purport of the statement.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was talking about the opportunity of gentlemen on the other side to discuss the question, Mr. President.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I desire to say that I withdrew the motion that I made to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] as modified by the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. I made the motion because of this protracted filibuster, which has been going on for nearly a week, since this bill reached the Senate, and the motion of the Senator from North Carolina was made to refer the bill to the Finance Committee. My idea was to bring the question directly to a vote and indirectly in that way to determine whether or not the Senate desires these hearings. If the motion to lay on the table was carried it would be an expression on the part of the Senate that it did not intend to enter upon hearings, and then there would be but one thing before the Senate—the naked question whether the bill should be referred to the committee. But acting upon the appeal of my friend the chairman of the committee of which I am a member to withdraw the motion, I did so, and if we can agree to an hour to vote I am perfectly willing. But if it can not be done, I shall again propose that we end this interminable debate by a motion to lay these amendments on the table, and then see whether we shall go on filibustering upon the mere proposition as to whether the bill shall be referred to the Finance Committee.

Mr. JAMES. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri a question. After those amendments were laid on the table, could not the Senators on the other side offer some others which you would have to lay on the table?

Mr. STONE. To be sure.

Mr. JAMES. You would have to continue to do that and lay those on the table; so the best way is to get an agreement for a vote.

Mr. STONE. I say so; I have said so. Hence I withdrew the motion. But I give notice now, all the same, that unless an agreement is made, as far as I am concerned, I am going to urge——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the request for unanimous consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request for unanimous consent that upon the adjournment of the Senate to-day it shall adjourn until 11 o'clock to-morrow; that at that hour the matter now pending before the Senate shall be taken up and, if needful, continued until the hour of 3 o'clock, after which time 10-minute speeches may be made until the hour of 4 o'clock, when a vote shall be taken, and then that the unfinished business—the resolution for the Paint Creek coal fields investigation—shall be taken up?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, that should be upon the motion and all pending amendments.

Mr. OLIVER. I ask that the request be put, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request for unanimous consent? The Chair hears none, and consent is given.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, May 16, 1913, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 15, 1913.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Father in heaven, we most earnestly pray for Thy spirit, that it may come in all fullness and possess our minds and hearts, that we may be quick of perception, clear of thought, wise of judgment, pure of motive, strong of action; that as individuals we may personify truth, justice, mercy, righteousness, peace, and good will, and thus satisfy our own aspirations and the desires of Thy heart revealed in Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Monday, May 12, 1913, was read and approved.

LEAVE TO WITHDRAW PAPERS.

Mr. LAFFERTY, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of H. R. 20450, for the relief of the Victor Land Co., Sixty-second Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Does this conference report present an agreement?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is a disagreement on the provision relating to the management of the soldiers' home.

Mr. MANN. Why not dispose of it this morning?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Senate must act on it first.

JOSEPH G. CANNON (H. DOC. NO. 48).

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a House document an article which appeared recently in the Saturday Evening Post, written by Mr. Cannon, former Speaker of the House.

Mr. THACHER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that certain resolutions relating to the tariff, adopted in New Bedford, Mass., be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. THACHER] asks unanimous consent that certain resolutions passed by citizens of New Bedford, Mass., on the subject of the tariff, be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. THACHER. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. THACHER. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted, I present the following resolution, which I wish to place in the RECORD, and which I indorse in part:

At a conference of representatives of all the mill corporations of New Bedford held May 2, 1913, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That we protest against the reductions in rates on cotton cloth, cotton yarns, and cotton manufactures contained in H. R. 3321, now pending in Congress, as too radical and too drastic, and which, if finally adopted, will seriously affect the whole cotton-manufacturing industry.

The cotton manufacturers of New Bedford, realizing the great importance of this proposed revision to its continued prosperity, respectfully urge upon Congress the necessity of so amending these rates as to enable our industries to meet the competition of foreign countries in the manufacture of fine cotton goods.

The business is a highly competitive one and for this reason, if for no other, every effort has been made by our manufacturers to practice and encourage efficiency in every department of effort.

The mills are modern, equipped with the best machinery, skillfully managed, and manned with competent operatives. No readjustment of tariff rates is needed to stimulate efficiency in our manufacture, nor will increased efficiency take the place of the proper and more favorable consideration of tariff rates which are needed to continue the prosperity of this industry in all its branches.

This whole community is deeply interested in this subject, and therefore not alone in our own interests, but in the interest of every phase of our community life we respectfully petition for an opportunity to present to Congress and its committees the protest and views of the New Bedford manufacturers.

On behalf of the committee:

FREDERIC H. TABER, Clerk.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 49.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House is hereby authorized to pay, out of the contingent fund, to Henry N. Lewis, nephew and sole heir of Elijah Lewis, late a messenger on the old soldiers' roll of the House, a sum not to exceed $250, for the funeral expenses of the said Elijah Lewis.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that at the end of the business of this morning I may be permitted to address the House for 15 minutes.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman upon what subject?

Mr. MONDELL. On the state of the Union. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARDWICK. I shall object unless the gentleman makes it a little more definite.

Mr. MONDELL. I desire to call attention to some remarks that have been made relative to the state of the industries of the country, but particularly to refer to some remarks made at a banquet last night in this city.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

OREGON LAND-GRANT DECISION.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD to include the printing of an editorial concerning the Oregon land-grant decision.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The following is the article referred to:

[From the Oregonian, Portland, Oreg., Thursday, May 1, 1913.]

LAND GRANT FORFEITED.

Judge Wolverton's decision forfeiting the Southern Pacific land grant was almost a foregone conclusion, but it can not become effective until it has been finally confirmed by the United States Supreme Court. In the meantime no disposition of the land can be made. The Southern Pacific's title is now so clouded that it could find no buyers, even though it complied strictly with the terms of the grant. The Government can do nothing until the grant is finally annulled and until Congress has provided by legislation for the disposal of the land. The decision is assurance that in not less than two years the way will have been cleared for raising the embargo on the development of southern Oregon, but how this will be done remains to be decided.

It is necessary to lay stress on these facts, because many persons have been deluded into the belief that by settling on tracts in the land grant or by making a tender of the legal price to the railroad they have established a prior claim to purchase whenever the forfeiture is confirmed. They have established nothing, but have simply thrown away their money. Forfeiture of the grant will rescind all its conditions and will restore the land to the public domain, but not render it open to settlement under any of the general land laws. The courts can only declare that the Government, not the railroad, is the owner. They can not declare on what terms it may be purchased from the Government; Congress alone can do that. Men who pay $200 to $250 apiece to lawyers and land locaters are buying a mere shoestring. Let them take warning and keep their money.

The decision is important as a judicial determination that the greatest corporations, like the poorest individual, must keep faith with the Government. When they acquire land from the Government, they must comply with the terms of the grant or give back the land. The homesteader can not get a patent without improving his claim and standing the fire of a special agent's inquiry and a land-office hearing. The railroad stands on the same footing. It has the money to fight a lawsuit through to the highest court, but the Government is equally ready and able to fight, and will do so. The decision means that there is to be an end of deals between the people and corporations wherein the people live up to their side of the bargain and the corporations ignore theirs.

It has been freely predicted that the forfeited land, being mostly timbered, will be added to the national forests and that there will be little, if any, left available for agriculture. This is by no means certain. Congress, during the Roosevelt administration, passed a law forbidding any further additions to the national forests without specific enactment. Congress has shown increasing reluctance to pass such laws. Much of the timbered grant land, being in the valleys and near the railroads, will be admirably adapted for farming when cleared. Such land may be turned over to the Forestry Bureau with orders to sell the timber without delay. It may then be thrown open to homesteading. The West will not consent to the legislative sanction of the Land Office's new classification of some land as "timbered homesteads" and to such land being withheld from settlement on that pretext. It would probably agree to the harvesting of the timber by the Government before agricultural settlers are admitted. That course would accord with the policy of conservation which carries with it the development of the country.

MILITIA ORGANIZATION AND DISTRIBUTION.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a resolution from the chamber of commerce in the city of Spokane, Wash., relative to the militia, its organization, and distribution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The following is the matter referred to:

Whereas it is the belief of the Spokane Chamber of Commerce and of the people of Spokane that these things are true:

That the approaching completion of the Panama Canal emphasizes the importance of the obligation assumed by the United States in the Monroe doctrine, wherein it is stated "that any attempt on the part of a foreign power to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere is dangerous to our peace and safety."

That the shifting of the world's activities to the Western Hemisphere and especially to the Pacific coast makes it a national duty to take every precaution to prevent warfare by a thorough organization of the forces of national defense and offense.

That in view of the overwhelming expense and disaster which has followed the early efforts of the American arms in all previous wars, the present force of 20 regiments of infantry on the mainland of the United States is so insufficient as to be a menace to all business conditions of the country.

That this insufficiency is now much more serious than it has been at the time of any previous war because of the new basis of greater science upon which all preparations for warfare are conducted. The wars of the past were struggles of closely massed men. The wars of the future will be widely extended, long-range operations in loose, open-order formation. In such contests there will be great dependence upon the responsibility of the individual officers and men. To attain success under such conditions necessitates high training, physical endurance, and skill. Small arms, machine guns, and field guns are being built for long range and rapid fire, with many complications and adjustments. Modern warfare will involve conditions never known in private life or in past wars. Arms, ammunition, and men for modern service require time to prepare and have ready, while wars are sudden and of terrific violence.

That the Army should not only be increased in numbers and equipment, but that the arrangement of the Army in the United States should be upon a carefully prepared plan to give a maximum of efficiency in time of war.

That in the preparation of such a plan particular attention should be given to the Pacific coast, not alone because of the opening of the Panama Canal, but because of the growing importance of the Orient.

That in the working out of such a plan Spokane is of great strategic importance. Spokane is protected by the chain of the Cascade Mountains with passes capable of fortification and defense.

That Spokane is a natural modern strategic center by reason of the seven transcontinental and many branch railroads entering at the city, supported by the railroad repair and construction shops. Spokane is a point where a large force can be concentrated and a large depot of supplies assembled ready to be quickly sent over any one of several railroads to any point on the coast or the frontier. Such a storage at any point on the coast would be impractical and unwise by reason of the ability of an enemy to land at any point on the north and south line of the coast and thus prevent the furnishing of aid or support from one coast point to another.

That in any development for higher efficiency Fort George Wright is invaluable to the Army. It is ideal for the work of the men because it has a healthy mountain climate. The Weather Bureau reports that in 30 years there has never been a death from excessive heat or cold. For maneuvers the soil is a gravelly loam favorable to all three arms—Infantry, Cavalry, and Field Artillery. The immediate locality of the post is favorable to varied field maneuvers of every kind.

That Fort George Wright is especially desirable for the work of the Army because of the interest at all times manifested by the people of Spokane, an interest dating from 20 years ago when the people of the city donated the magnificent site to the United States Government.

Therefore, in view of all these facts, the Spokane Chamber of Commerce does hereby adopt and spread upon its minutes the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the United States should have a larger Army.

Resolved, That for the greater efficiency of the Army on the North Pacific coast Fort George Wright should be enlarged into a brigade post and be made a depot for the storage of reserve military supplies.

Resolved further, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted to the Secretary of War, the Chief of Staff, and the Senators and the Representatives in Congress from the State of Washington.

PRINTING ADDRESS OF COL. TOWNSEND, PRESIDENT MISSISSIPPI RIVER COMMISSION.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have published as a House document an address delivered by Col. Townsend, president of the Mississippi River Commission and a member of the Army Corps of Engineers, recently delivered before the drainage convention in the city of St. Louis.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to have printed as a House document an address by Col. Townsend at the drainage convention. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized for 15 minutes.

THE TARIFF.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, on the last day of the debate in the House on the Underwood tariff bill, in discussing the point of order raised by him on the motion to recommit, offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] digressed from his discussion of the point of order to issue what I assume he intended as a solemn warning, in the following language:

Mr. Speaker, we have established a Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce that goes far beyond anything that these gentlemen desire to obtain in their tariff board, and it is well for the country to know it. It not only has the power to investigate the question of cost either here or abroad, the amount of imports and exports and American consumption, but when a great manufacturing institution is ready to threaten its laborers with a reduction of wages because they say there has been adverse action and legislation in Congress, or to reflect on the action of the Government of the United States, that bureau has the power to walk into their offices and ascertain whether there is real reason for their cutting the rates of wages of their labor or whether it is merely a selfish attempt to put money into their own pockets. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The statement has been made that this tariff bill will act on labor and affect the wages of laboring men. I give you notice now that when the men from whom you bring that message endeavor to grind labor in the interest of Republican politics there is a bureau of this Government that is going to ascertain the reason why. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, at the time the gentleman from Alabama uttered these words he had been under a severe strain for nearly two weeks piloting his bill through the House. He had been compelled to listen to some very severe criticism of the measure and to the perfectly sincere and very emphatic statements made by gentlemen on both sides of the aisle to the effect that the proposed legislation threatened the prosperity, and, in some cases, the very existence of great industries, and, consequently, the rate of wages and the employment of many people. The gentleman from Alabama is good-natured and a good deal of a philosopher, and yet these criticisms and warnings quite naturally somewhat disturbed his usual imperturbable equanimity. He therefore had perhaps some license for a little extravagance of statement. Under ordinary circumstances I think the gentleman would have hesitated to warn those engaged in enterprises threatened by his bill that they must continue to operate without any reduction of wages, without regard to the financial loss that such operation might entail. In the heat of debate the gentleman attempted to convey the impression that any suspension of business which might occur, or reduction of wages that might follow, would be purely for political purposes, and based on this false and unfair hypothesis he proceeds to utter a warning entirely unwarranted under the circumstances. Possibly the bluff of the gentleman from Alabama can be forgiven in view of the condition of its utterance.

The morning papers bring us, however, notice of a threat which, in view of its source and its apparent careful preparation, can not be so readily overlooked. We are informed that the honorable Secretary of the Department of Commerce, in the course of some remarks at the banquet of the National Association of Employing Lithographers, at the Willard last evening, following the expression of fears on the part of some of those present that the Underwood bill threatened employment and wages, proceeded to make some very pointed remarks along the lines of the statement made by the gentleman from Alabama, a portion of which are reported in the Washington Post, as follows:

PURPOSE OF THE DEPARTMENT.

"The Department of Commerce exists," said the Secretary, "for the purpose of promoting American industry and commerce at home and abroad. It intends to do its work as well as it can with the force and funds provided. As the head of that department, I feel that while its scope in aiding commerce is broad and has many phases, one of these phases which is important is that of turning light upon inefficiencies wherever they can be found.

"I have spoken frankly, gentlemen, on this particular line, because I have received a circular, issued under the auspices of your association, from which I take these words, referring to the reduction in the tariff on the goods in which you are interested as producers:

WARNING TO LITHOGRAPHERS.

"'This means workmen thrown out of jobs. It means that wages must go down in order to compete. It may mean longer hours than 48 hours a week.'

"You have been yourselves, you see, as frank as I, and your statement was made first. If, in the final result, the words I have quoted are put into effect by you in a substantial degree, it may become the duty of the Department of Commerce to inquire into your business methods."

Every right-minded citizen is heartily in sympathy with every proper effort of Government departments to bend their energies toward the establishment of favorable conditions among American industries and toward the maintenance of fair and equitable relations between the managers and the management of industries and those who as employees in such industries, through their skill and labor, render them successful. The Department of Commerce and the Department of Labor are particularly charged with responsibility in these matters, and will have the support of all the people in the performance of their duty along these lines; but I know of no statute which contemplates that a department of the Government shall attempt to coerce men into continuing an enterprise or attempting to continue it without modification of terms of employment when conditions brought about by legislation render the continuation of the industry under present or past conditions of operation and employment impossible without serious financial loss. Has the Secretary of the Department of Commerce any funds at his disposal whereby he can compensate employers for losses which would accrue from the continuation of enterprises on the present basis of wages should the effect of the Underwood bill be to make it impossible to thus continue the enterprise without serious financial loss?

Mr. Speaker, remarks somewhat similar to those I have quoted have been made by some very high in office and authority, and I think it is about time that some attention was paid to and reference made to them. In my opinion they are at this time less warranted than ever in the history of tariff legislation. At the beginning of my remarks on the Underwood bill I called attention to the peculiarly favorable conditions and circumstances under which our friends on the other side have undertaken the revision of the tariff. In my opinion there is nowhere in the country any considerable number of men who, whatever their fears may be relative to the effect of that legislation, are not anxious that they may be able under it to continue their enterprises without loss, and in this state of the public mind, in this condition, when even those who fear the most are themselves most anxious that you shall be successful, it is peculiarly ungracious, to use no stronger term, that men in high station, charged with great responsibility, should in cold blood—not in the heat of debate—in carefully prepared statements warn the employers of the country that unless they continue to run their industries, unless they continue to run them under the plan relative to wages and employment now in force, they shall have their business inquired into by a Government bureau which arrogates to itself the authority to inquire and to decide as to the motives which actuate a shutting down, a limiting of production, or an attempt to keep going by a reduction of wages. We are gravely informed by the head of a Government department that he proposes, if enterprises in any way modify their business after the passage of the Underwood bill, to make inquiry and ascertain whether their machinery is up to date, whether their methods of operation are entirely satisfactory from the viewpoint of the high and mighty Secretary of Commerce.

I must say that of all I have ever heard during tariff debates some things that have been said along these lines are the most extraordinary. Does the Secretary of the Department of Commerce believe that he can compensate the flockmasters of my State, for instance, for the losses they are sure to suffer under this bill? We hope, we pray, that those losses will be comparatively light, but that loss will come all must admit. If not, what rhyme or reason was there in your action? Wool was placed on the free list for the purpose of reducing the value of the product. If that was not the object, there was none. And can you reduce the value of that product without disturbing the industry? Is there a department of the Government somewhere to compensate for such loss? If there is, the flockmasters of my Commonwealth will be entitled to apply, for our losses are certain. Has the Department of Commerce some method of compensating the manufacturers of beet and cane sugar for the certain dismantlement of the great majority of their factories, admitted practically by all? Has the Secretary of Commerce a fund at his disposal to compensate the farmers who are to lose heavily if the reduced values of their products promised under this bill shall materialize; and is he prepared to guarantee that the wage of farm and ranch labor shall be maintained?

The Secretary serves notice that he proposes to inquire, should industries be suspended or crippled in output or opportunity of employment, as to their business methods, their efficiency, their up-to-dateness. Is that for the purpose of serving notice on them that they must run their business according to a method prescribed by the Secretary; and if not, what does he propose to do about it? Should his advice and recommendations be followed and business continued, is he prepared to guarantee reasonable returns, or any returns at all? Does he expect to compensate for losses incurred under such conditions? Have we come to that pass that a department of the Government shall rise and say that men whose lifelong savings are jeopardized, men anxious to carry on their industries, men desirous of paying good wages, shall be threatened because, forsooth, they, in perfect good nature and good faith and with intense sincerity, insist that their industries are jeopardized? You are fortunate, gentlemen, you are fortunate beyond all experience in the attitude of the American people toward your revision, and in heaven's name be gracious enough to acknowledge and be thankful for this frame of mind. It is not possible, and you all know it, that with the great range of our industries, multiplied thousands in kind and character, from one end of the Nation to the other, that some will not be seriously disturbed by this radical legislation.

Products of great volume and value, the fruits of the labors of a vast number of people, can not be taken from the dutiable list and placed on the free list without seriously, if not disastrously affecting, not only investment, but labor as well. Industries great and small can not have the rates of tariff schedules which affect them radically changed without serious disturbance, without probable destruction to some and serious injury to all. No thoughtful person denies the truth, to a certain extent at least, of this assertion, and as labor is the largest element in production, and wages paid to labor a large proportion of the cost of any product, there can be no denying the fact that this radical legislation of yours seriously threatens a loss of employment in certain lines of activity and rates of wages in many lines. Yet because men honestly express their fears in regard to these matters they are threatened with some undefined sort of coercion, a threat which would be ridiculous if it was not intended to carry a real menace from official sources to those who, from the standpoint of certain Government officials, may be so unpatriotic as to decline to carry on their business at a permanent loss.

As a matter of fact, the legislation is urged with the claim that there must be a lowering in the returns of certain industries for the general good, and a very serious one in certain lines. The American people are anxious, if they can, to adjust their affairs to your legislation. I do not think there is an employer anywhere who desires to reduce wages. In your effort to do what you believe is the right thing to do, and thus necessarily threatening or jeopardizing employment, you certainly should restrain yourselves from threatening men who, in their efforts to readjust to meet changed conditions, fear they will find it necessary to ask their employees to decide between less favorable labor conditions or the closing down of industries. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] asks unanimous consent that he may address the House for 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, it is not my desire to reopen the case that has been sent to the Senate. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] is a typical representative of his party, able, strong, but a thorough exponent of the doctrine of protection for the great industries of this country. He has shown the dividing line this morning. For years gentlemen on that side of the House have stated that they levied the tariff taxes in this country in the interest of labor. To-day the glove is off the mailed hand, and the gentleman from Wyoming exposes the ground on which his party has always stood. [Applause on the Democratic side.] He stands here only in the interest of the great manufacturers of this country and cares nothing whatever for the labor that works in the factories. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now, the situation is simply this: If you will examine the tariff hearings which were held last winter before the Ways and Means Committee you will find page after page and volume after volume filled with the statements of the manufacturers that if the Democratic House dared to reduce this protective tariff in the interest of the American people that they would take that reduction out of the labor in their mills and their factories, and you can not deny it. Man after man in these great industries came before us and stated that what reduction you make shall come out of the labor——

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield—the gentleman wants to be fair.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. MONDELL. I think that the gentleman did not have anyone before his committee who made just such a statement as the gentleman has made.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; I have.

Mr. MONDELL. Many gentlemen said they could not continue to operate under changed conditions without a reduction of wages.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is exactly what I said, there is no difference; that they would take the reduction out of their labor and not out of their own profits.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman expect them to run permanently at a loss?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not if they are not making unreasonable profits, and many of them, and the gentleman knows it as well as I do, have made enormous profits, and now they would continue to keep those enormous profits at the expense of their labor, and more than that, gentlemen on that side of the House for more than two weeks in the debate in this House on the tariff bill contended that if we passed that bill it meant that the effects of the bill would be visited on the labor of this country. Now I want it distinctly understood that we are not threatening industry, nor are we threatening labor. You contended here that we needed a tariff board to ascertain facts in order that the rights of industry and the rights of labor might be well guarded. I told you you did not need a tariff board, that we had already organized a board in this Government that could ascertain the facts and would ascertain the facts, and now that the machinery of Government has started to ascertain the facts you throw up your hands and show the white feather and run to cover, because you are afraid to have a just and a fair investigation. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That is all. There is no desire on the part of the Government to interfere with any industry. We have got no right to stop them, but when we see conditions in this country existing that will be detrimental to labor we are entitled to know one of two things. First, whether or not they are telling the truth. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If they are not telling the truth and they intend to injuriously and unfairly punish their labor, taking an enactment of Congress as an excuse, then it is nothing but right that the facts should be given publicity and the people of the United States should know the facts. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

That is all there is to that side of it. On the other hand, if a law on the statute books has in any particular instance been so drastic that it may affect the great industrial interests in this country and affect the wages of their labor, whether you want to know it or not, this side of the House wants to know it, because we propose to do abstract justice, and if we have made a mistake we will not be afraid to recognize it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

We do not intend to hide behind closed doors, but we are prepared to throw the limelight of public opinion not only on the acts of the manufacturer, but the acts of this House. If we have made a mistake we are men enough to acknowledge it and rectify it [applause on the Democratic side], and if we have not we will see that the other man does justice——

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will.

Mr. MONDELL. Does not the gentleman think he will know without an investigation of the Department of Commerce if the industries of the country are seriously jeopardized or seriously injured, and do I have his promise that if there are any industries which are seriously injured by your bill the injustice shall be rectified by legislation in the near future?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. When the Department of Commerce report, after a careful, disinterested, and honest investigation, that an injustice has been done either to an industry of this country or to the labor employed in that industry, you may rest assured that this side of the House will rectify any wrong which has been done.

Mr. MONDELL. Does that include the wool industry and the sugar industry?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, there are some propositions that we recognize are not entitled to be classed as legitimate industries any more than you can grow lemons in Maine, or that we expect to continue an artificial or improperly conducted or improperly managed industry. But we are entitled to know the facts, and we are going to know them. It is no threat. These men came before the committee and made their statements about this labor matter. Many of them invited the committee to inspect their books. The committee did not have the machinery with which to do it. But the committee is investigating the pottery industry in this country, and, following that investigation, is going on with other industries.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] will have a bill before the House to-morrow. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President——

Mr. MYERS. I will ask the Senator from Kentucky if he will yield to me to present a matter for the RECORD before he begins.

Mr. JAMES. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. PENROSE. I did not hear the request of the Senator.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. He wishes to put some matter in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. Does it relate to this bill?

Mr. MYERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. President, during the discussion of the last few days upon the pending motion a number of documents and communications have been read, notably a lengthy communication to a Senator from a gentleman, styling himself a Democrat, in Michigan, in which he tells about all the dire things that will happen to him and the Democratic Party and the country in general if the special privileges enjoyed by him and his associates at the hands of the Government and at the expense of the people be withdrawn by enactment of the House tariff bill. It has been well styled by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] a brief for the sugar manufacturers.

This week I have received a telegraphic communication, in the nature of a petition, from parties in Montana, which may be styled a brief for protected interests. It is very brief and very pointed. It is admirable as a model of brevity, conciseness, and frankness. It is much in little. In three lines it expresses all that is expressed in the doleful appeal of the Michigan gentleman. I, too, received a copy of the direful Michigan appeal, and I can make reply to both in one reply. I read the telegram referred to received by me:

MOORE, MONT., May 12, 1913.

Senator MYERS, Washington, D. C.:

Standing pat for a proper protection of the wool and sugar industries will be appreciated by your constituents in this vicinity.

MOORE COMMERCIAL CLUB.

That is admirable for concise advice. Stand pat for protection for wool and sugar! Some of my constituents seem to be under a misapprehension as to my politics. The reply that I made to that telegram will serve to answer all like communications that I have received or may receive from Montana or elsewhere. In answer I wrote as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 13, 1913.

MOORE COMMERCIAL CLUB, Moore, Mont.

GENTLEMEN: I am in receipt of your telegram of the 12th, reading: "Standing pat for a proper protection of the wool and sugar industries will be appreciated by your constituents in this vicinity."

I assure you that I am standing pat, but I am standing pat for the people—the great masses of struggling people who enjoy no special privileges at the hands of the Government that they toil to help support. I must respectfully decline to stand pat for protection of the wool or sugar industry or any other special interest enjoying special privileges for the benefit of the few at the expense of the many.

I do not consider that I was elected to the Senate to stand pat for the wool and sugar industries of Montana, but to represent all of the people of the whole State of Montana and to legislate for the greatest good to the greatest number. If your views differ from these, I regret it, but can not help it. I can not surrender my convictions.

Mr. President, I did not know that when I was elected to this honorable body I was a standpatter. I did not know that I was ever considered a standpatter. However, as long as the appellation has been tendered me, I will accept it, and I now announce that I will stand pat for the interests of the whole people and all of the people, for the masses, the millions who are struggling under a load of taxation for the benefit of a favored few. I will stand pat for protection of the masses. The time has come when the people need protection from special interests. I now announce that I am for free wool and free sugar. Tariff reform, like charity, should begin at home. Let us first strip our own protected interests of special privilege. Then we are in a position to demand that others be required to do likewise. I am against special privilege in my own section as well as other sections of the country.

As to the pending motion for hearings on the tariff bill, I do not favor allowing unlimited and indefinite hearings before the Senate Finance Committee to keep us here all summer and allow the representatives of protected interests to work the country into a fevered state of alarm and a furore of anxiety over dire predictions of calamity to ensue upon the withdrawal of their special privileges. They can easily prove on paper that the country and everybody in it will be ruined if their special favors be withdrawn or diminished. I am against the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE].

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask the Senator from Kentucky to yield to me for one moment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. JAMES. I do.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask unanimous consent that after the Senator from Kentucky closes his speech, which I understand will take only about 40 minutes, the time of Senators be limited until 3 o'clock to half an hour.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I object to that request. It is too late to make the request at this time.

Mr. PENROSE. We can not modify the unanimous-consent agreement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has been unanimously agreed that debate shall be limited after 3 o'clock.

Mr. SIMMONS. We have not in this debate limited the speech of any Senators, and I must object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kentucky will proceed.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, when the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] was addressing the Senate the other day I inquired of him if it was not true that the Ways and Means Committee had given all the time desired to the sugar industry to present their case. He answered with perfect scorn, and said that they were offered only 45 minutes; that that was all the time they could get; that they had not had an opportunity to present their case to the committee; that they were cut off without the slightest chance by the committee.

I wish to read from the hearings of the Ways and Means Committee, of which I was a member at that time, what occurred. The chairman, Mr. UNDERWOOD, said:

If that be agreeable to the witnesses, all right; but I do not want to make the witnesses do what they do not want to do, and unless it is agreed we will call the calendar. If it is agreed upon, we will follow that agreement to a total limit of five hours, if necessary, instead of following the calendar.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I think an hour and a quarter will be satisfactory to the cane people. Of course I am not speaking for the beet-sugar people.

That was the statement of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD]. They were given an hour and a half, and a total time of 5 hours, every particle of time they said was necessary to present their case.

Now, the distinguished Senator from Louisiana comes upon the floor of this Chamber and charges that the Ways and Means Committee denied them an opportunity to present their case. I said to him that the sugar question had been investigated only recently by the Hardwick special investigating committee; that they had taken testimony embracing many volumes, covering more than 4,000 pages; that every phase of that question had been gone into; that a thorough and complete investigation had been made.

I find that in addition to that, as suggested by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], the Finance Committee of the Senate last year gave hearings upon the sugar question which consumed considerable time, several weeks, and covered many hundreds of pages.

Mr. SIMMONS. Nine hundred.

Mr. JAMES. Nine hundred pages. Now, we are told by the Senator from Louisiana that Louisiana's industry is to be murdered in the Senate without a hearing being given to it.

Why, Mr. President, I have no hesitancy in saying that there is no Senator upon this floor who in three months' time could read and digest the testimony that has been taken upon the sugar question. What the American people want is action by Congress, not delay. I have talked with more than 200 men who have come to me because I am a member of the Subcommittee on Finance, we having before our committee many of these schedules, each one of them making suggestions and presenting to me his brief, some wanting rates to remain as written, some wanting rates raised, others the rates lowered; but practically all of them said they wanted action and not delay, they wanted the bill passed—immediate action—they all agreed upon that; they knew the American people had in two Nation-wide contests spoken, and that their voice should be at once obeyed, and the American people will not approve the action of any Senator upon this floor, whether it be the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] or a Senator of one of the minority parties upon the other side, who seeks to hold the great business interests of this Republic up in the air while they talk and talk investigate and investigate a question that has been most thoroughly and completely investigated; and the hearings, testimony, and briefs upon the tariff in all its schedules now reach more than 20,000 pages.

The Senator took me to task because I read the Democratic national platform and said that that platform declared for free sugar. I am here to defend that declaration; I am here to prove that statement. The Senator says in a letter that he presents from my good friend BROUSSARD, covering the fatal number of 13 pages, that the platform adopted at Baltimore did not mean free sugar, and he gives certain reasons why it was not the purpose of that convention to declare for free sugar. I am perfectly frank in saying to the Senator that I hope I may be excused from accepting the version of the Democratic Party's platform as enunciated by Mr. BROUSSARD, because I recall, Mr. President, that Mr. BROUSSARD voted for the Dingley tariff bill and he voted for the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill, the two most oppressive protection measures ever written into law; and I have no doubt that he could have written a letter—it might not have taken 13 pages, perhaps it might have taken more—to have shown to his own satisfaction that the Democratic platform justified such a vote. So this, I take it, explains why I refuse to accept the "Broussard version" of the Democratic platform.

But the criticism the Senator makes is that, after I read the first part of this platform, I did not read it all. Let us see. Here was the part I read:

At this time, when the Republican Party, after a generation of unlimited power in its control of the Federal Government, is rent into factions, it is opportune to point to the record of accomplishment of the Democratic House of Representatives in the Sixty-second Congress. We indorse its action and we challenge comparison of its record with that of any Congress which has been controlled by our opponents.

You say I did not read it all. What is it that you say limits this sweeping indorsement of the action of a Democratic House of Representatives—not the action of Democrats in Congress, which would have included the Senators; not at all—but the Democratic national convention adopted a platform that indorsed the action of the Democratic House of Representatives. What was its action? Chief among its acts of relief to the American people was free sugar. What follows? Here is what the Senator says I ought to have read:

We call the attention of the patriotic citizens of our country to its record of efficiency, economy, and constructive legislation.

It has, among other achievements, revised the rules of the House of Representatives so as to give to the representatives of the American people freedom of speech and of action in advocating, proposing, and perfecting remedial legislation.

It has passed bills for the relief of the people and the development of our country.

Is not that an indorsement of free sugar? Is it not a relief to the people to give them free sugar—untaxed sugar? It would have saved them annually $115,000,000.

But the platform proceeds:

It has endeavored to revise the tariff taxes downward in the interest of the consuming masses, and thus reduce the high cost of living.

Does not free sugar reduce the cost of living? The platform proceeds:

It has proposed an amendment to the Federal Constitution providing for the election of United States Senators by the direct vote of the people.

It has secured the admission of Arizona and New Mexico as two sovereign States.

It has required the publicity of campaign expenses, both before and after election, and fixed a limit upon the election expenses of United States Senators and Representatives.

It has also passed a bill to prevent the abuse of the writ of injunction.

It has passed a law establishing an eight-hour day for workmen on all national public work.

It has passed a resolution which forced the President to take immediate steps to abrogate the Russian treaty.

And it has passed the great supply bills which lessen waste and extravagance and which reduce the annual expenses of the Government by many millions of dollars.

And there it stops. The Senator from Louisiana says that because I did not read that portion that that is a limitation of the indorsement written by the convention of the action of a Democratic Congress in passing a free sugar bill. Is there any reference there to the woolen bill? Is there any reference there to the cotton bill? Is there any reference there to the chemical schedule? Is there any reference there to the excise tax bill? Not one; yet if your version is true, the Democratic national convention assembled at Baltimore indorsed nothing done by the Democratic Congress except those things suggested there.

But the Senator asked another question in the letter of Mr. BROUSSARD, and stated that the Democratic platform used these words:

We denounce the action of President Taft in vetoing the bills to reduce the tariff in the cotton, woolen, metal, and chemical schedules and the farmers' free-list bill, all of which were designed to give immediate relief to the masses from the exactions of the trusts.

You ask why they did not include sugar in that? It is a very simple and very plain answer, that a sugar bill was not vetoed by the President. That is why they did not include it there. Do they include an excise-tax bill there? No. Why? For the very same reason that the excise-tax bill did not pass the American Congress and get to the President. Would you say that we did not include the excise tax bill and we therefore repudiated it?

The Democratic Party has for 25 years, Mr. President, challenged the opposition of the fortunes of the Republic, demanding just taxation in favor of the common people of this land. Will you say that because they did not specify that by name, therefore the Democratic Party has repudiated it? Would not the excise tax bill be included with free sugar, the woolen bill, the cotton bill, and the free list bill under the national Democratic platform indorsement of bills passed for the relief of the people and also bills to reduce the cost of living! The party that fought on and on and finally succeeded in having the Federal Constitution amended for the first time in a hundred years, except by the sword of war? Yet, according to the argument of my distinguished friend, the Democratic Party repudiated the excise-tax bill and repudiated the free-sugar bill because they are not included as having been vetoed by the President—when they were not passed through Congress, so the President could veto them.

He says in addition to that that Senators over here voted against free sugar. Certainly they did. They were voting to get the maximum relief possible from an opposition body. Certainly the Democrats here were contented, if they could not get a whole loaf, to take a half loaf; certainly the Democratic Senators here, seeing that they could not get the Underwood wool bill, accepted the La Follette wool bill. Is it to be urged because a few Senators upon this side of the Chamber voted to give such relief as they thought was the most they could obtain for the American people, that therefore that binds the Democratic Party?

Let me say to my distinguished friend that the Democratic platform is not written by a few Senators, however great they may be; it is not written by yonder House, in which I served 10 years with you; it is not written by the version of Mr. BROUSSARD. The Democratic platform is written by the assembled hosts of Democracy fresh from the people from every part of this Republic in convention assembled.

My friend says that it was in the atmosphere over at Baltimore that we were to have a tax on sugar. I will say this: Democratic platforms are not written in the atmosphere. There were a great many things in the air at Baltimore, but I never heard it suggested before that opposition to free sugar was there.

The Senator said I made a speech in that convention in which I advocated free sugar. That is true. I have it here. But he did not tell all. In recounting to that convention the triumphs of the Democratic Party I enumerated the wool bill, the metal bill, the cotton bill, the chemical schedule bill, and then I said:

Then we offered to the American people a bill taking the tax off sugar, giving to them free sugar and placing an excise tax on all incomes in excess of $5,000. This bill is now in the Senate of the United States unacted upon.

I believe in free sugar. It will save every householder in this country 2 cents upon every pound of sugar. I believe in a tax upon incomes; I believe in an excise tax and I deny that the people who are well to do, those who are rich, those who are so fortunate as to have their thousands pouring in every year, are unwilling to bear their part of the burden of taxation to sustain this mighty Government of ours.

That met the enthusiastic approval of that convention. But not only did I as the permanent chairman call attention to free sugar, but the temporary chairman, Judge Parker, did likewise. Here is an extract from his speech:

Under sagacious and intrepid Democratic leadership special bills have been passed having for their purpose a revision of the tariff downward, ultimately to a revenue basis. These bills are known as "Free list—Wool, cotton, metals, chemicals, sugar, and excise." The President's use of the veto power has postponed, however, the hour when the people shall enter into the enjoyment of the relief proposed until after the inauguration of the next President.

That sentiment of the temporary chairman of that convention met the enthusiastic approval of the convention.

But let us go further, Mr. President. My friend read from a book yesterday; but I fear he has not looked carefully into it. Here was the book [exhibiting] from which he read. I have it in my hand now, with a different cover. It is the Democratic Textbook of 1912, issued by the Democratic national committee and the Democratic congressional committee. Has the Senator ever looked into that? It is worthy of his perusal. I will quote from this book. It was sent broadcast to every Democratic orator as giving our position upon the various questions that have been discussed. Among the many things enumerated I find this:

It has made an excellent record—

Speaking of the Democratic Congress—

It has made an excellent record in revising the tariff downward to a revenue basis, having passed measures thus affecting the schedules of most vital moment to the people, namely, wool, cotton, metal, chemical, and has placed sugar and other necessary food products on free list.

But that is not all. The Democratic textbook goes further, and I find, in addition to that, that it has this to say upon the question of sugar. I read from page 82:

The bill placing sugar on the free list was passed in deference to a very general and persistent demand on the part of consumers. By it the consumers would save during a year not less than $115,000,000 from sugar prices, and if enacted the measure will substantially reduce the cost of living. The tariff tax on sugar amounts to about 1½ cents per pound. As this entire tax enters into the price of sugar to the consumer, it is easy to estimate the consumer's burdens because of tariff duties on sugar. The amount of sugar consumed in continental United States in 1911 was about 7,663,000,000 pounds, and the application of 1½ cents per pound to this consumption affords the estimate of $115,000,000 as representing the saving to the people.

Does the Senator mean to tell me that he claims allegiance to a party whose national committee and congressional committee, resting their belief upon this Democratic platform in favor of free sugar, would scatter broadcast as the word of the party, to advise the people where we stood and give utterance to words like these, if we were not in reality for free sugar?

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. JAMES. Certainly.

Mr. RANSDELL. Is it not a fact that the President, our standard bearer last fall, said in a speech at Pittsburgh that the Democratic Party did not stand for free trade or anything approaching free trade?

Mr. JAMES. Certainly; and he does not. I was coming to that. The Senator asked me that question yesterday. I will answer it. President Wilson does not stand for free trade. This bill that is to-day before the Senate will produce a revenue of $300,000,000 to the Public Treasury. Does the Senator call that a free-trade measure? But let me ask the Senator a question. If President Wilson is a free trader because he advocates free sugar, what was the Senator when he advocated free meat, and free bread, and free boots, and free shoes, and free farming implements? He voted for the farmers' and laborers' free-list bill. Is he a free trader?

Mr. RANSDELL. No; I am not; but I want to ask this question——

Mr. JAMES. Well, I wish the Senator would tell me the difference between himself and the President. If he denominates the President a free trader because he is for free sugar, why is the Senator not a free trader when he was for free boots and shoes and meats and bread and farming implements?

Mr. RANSDELL. I have not said that the President was a free trader.

Mr. JAMES. That was the argument the Senator used.

Mr. RANSDELL. I said that the President in his Pittsburgh speech said that the Democratic Party did not stand for free trade, or anything approaching free trade.

Mr. JAMES. Certainly, he did.

Mr. RANSDELL. Is it not free trade when you put sugar on the free list? Is it not free trade in one of the greatest revenue-producing commodities we have?

Mr. JAMES. The Senator draws his conclusion of what constitutes free trade, not when he votes to put the products of other people upon the free list but when other people vote to put his products upon the free list. That is the Senator's definition of a free trader. [Laughter.]

Mr. RANSDELL. Will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. JAMES. Certainly.

Mr. RANSDELL. The Senator says this campaign book was scattered broadcast. Is it or is it not a fact that when our campaign speakers were sent to the Western States they were told not to discuss the question of free sugar; and is it not a fact that if they had discussed free sugar and intimated that we were going to have free sugar we would never have carried those Western States?

Mr. JAMES. No, sir; I deny that the Democratic Party is guilty of such duplicity as the Senator suggests. If I believed it was, I would withdraw my allegiance from it and take my seat upon the other side of the Chamber. I spoke in the West, and everywhere I went I advocated free sugar, and I got more applause for free sugar than for any other schedule which I said we would revise for the relief of the American people. But let me proceed.

Mr. RANSDELL. Will the Senator let me explain?

Mr. JAMES. Certainly.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. ASWELL, a Member of Congress from my State, went out West and made a number of speeches for the party, and in getting his instructions at Chicago from the national campaign committee he was told, so I am informed, that he must not discuss the question of free sugar.

Mr. JAMES. Because they thought he would take the position that the Senator takes in favor of a tariff on sugar. That is why he was told that.

Mr. RANSDELL. But they told him that.

Mr. JAMES. Certainly; and I would have told the Senator that also if I had sent him out to make speeches. [Laughter.]

Mr. RANSDELL. He voted for this bill, did he not?

Mr. JAMES. I do not know how he voted; but I can understand why the campaign committee would suggest to a Democrat from Louisiana not to talk about sugar when he went out West.

Mr. RANSDELL. Would the Senator not consider that duplicity if they gave one kind of instructions to one man and another kind to another?

Mr. JAMES. Not at all. I would consider that the Democratic Party believed that the Louisiana gentleman had the wrong view on the sugar question, a view not in keeping with the Democratic platform, and they did not want to commission him to go out there and make votes against his party by repudiating his party platform. But, now, let us see. The Senator talks about the West. The West has no terrors for me, my dear friend; it is a glorious part of this Republic. I will read you something from the West:

RESOLUTION FAVORING SUGAR DUTY DEFEATED AT FRUITA, 64 TO 5.

[Evening Telegraph.]

FRUITA, COLO., May 12.

A resolution urging the retention of the present duty on sugar was defeated by a vote of 64 to 5 at a meeting of the chamber of commerce Saturday night. The members of the organization signed a petition to the Colorado delegation in Congress urging them to support the administration tariff bill, sugar clause and all. Fruita furnishes two-thirds of the beet supply for the Grand Junction sugar factory.

That is out West. Why, as I understand the sentiment in the West, the Senator from Colorado stood for free sugar and was elected to the Senate from that great State. In Louisiana, if I may be pardoned for suggesting it, if the consumers of sugar in that great State would take as much interest in inquiring how Senators and Congressmen were to vote as the sugar barons take, perhaps we would have more advocacy of free sugar in Louisiana.

But the Senator suggested in his speech yesterday that the President of the United States was advocating free trade because he wanted to put sugar upon the free list. Why, I have the RECORD here—I brought it so that there might be no mistake—where the Senator himself voted to override President Taft's veto of the farmers' and laborers' free-list bill, which placed on the free list agricultural implements, cotton bagging, cotton ties, leather, boots and shoes, fence wire, meat, cereals, flour, bread, timber, lumber, sewing machines, salt, and other articles. I find that the Senator voted to pass that bill over the President's veto; and I find that his distinguished colleague [Mr. BROUSSARD] voted to pass the bill in the House of Representatives. I have not yet looked to see whether he voted to pass it over the President's veto or not. I will now look. No; he did not vote for it, but he was paired for it:

Mr. BROUSSARD and Mr. SLAYDEN for passing the bill over the President's veto, with Mr. FORDNEY against.

You know it took two-thirds to pass the bill over the veto—so it took two votes to pass the bill over the veto—to one opposing it.

The Democratic Party can not be called a free-trade party because it favors putting on the free list some necessities of life, things entering directly into the consumption of every home and every family, at every fireside. Neither President Wilson nor any other Democrat who takes that position is any more a free trader than the Senator himself or his distinguished colleague [Mr. BROUSSARD].

But I did not read all this Democratic textbook. I tell you it is a valuable thing, and I knew what a pile of dynamite the Senator was holding in his hand yesterday. He had not looked into this book. Let me read from this Democratic textbook, expounding our faith:

The family sugar bowl.—How a protective tariff extorts from the humblest consumer.

There is an article here of nearly six pages in favor of the Democratic position for free sugar. Among other things it says:

The total cost to the American consumer annually by reason of the duty is $125,675,000. Of this $52,300,000 goes to the Government in revenue, the balance goes into the pockets of the tariff-favored sugar interests of Hawaii, Porto Rico, the Philippines, Cuba, Louisiana planters, and promoters of beet-sugar factories, as a bounty from the Government. The tariff on sugar is perhaps the best illustration of the extortionate operation of our tariff laws. The Government levies a tax upon the imported half, from which is collected 17 per cent of our entire customs revenue. The domestic producers, who supply us with half of our requirements, base their prices on the value of imported sugar, plus the duty, so that the American consumer pays the equivalent of the full amount of the duty on all the sugar he consumes.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President——

Mr. JAMES. Just a moment, until I get through reading this; you may want to ask about some more of it as I go along.

After receiving subsidies, both through direct bounties and indirectly through the tariff, for over 100 years, the sugar industry of Louisiana, if it can not stand alone, has no further claim upon the American people.

It is absurd to ask the Government to continue to tax consumers, through the tariff, $125,000,000 annually so that Louisiana may produce a crop, the yearly value of which is about $25,000,000. We should look to industries that could be of service to the American people and not to industries that the American people must serve.

The absurdity of attempting to frame a tariff on the "difference of cost of production between here and abroad" theory is shown first by the wide range in the cost of production at home. The beet-sugar factories in California, by their own reports, produce sugar at 2.70 cents per pound. The Hardwick investigating committee found that the average cost to produce beet sugar in the United States was 3.54 cents per pound. Louisiana claims that it cost 3.75 cents per pound to produce raw sugar, and it would cost at least 0.60 cent more to refine and market this, making the cost 4.35 cents per pound. What is the cost of producing sugar in the United States?

It is absurd to say that the consumer will not receive the benefit from a material reduction or the removal of the duty on sugar. Every dealer in sugar knows the fallacy of this, and the domestic producers' clamor for the maintenance of the present duty is a recognition that if the tariff is reduced they will be forced to sell their product at lower prices.

The proof of the effect of the tariff is the difference between the domestic price of 5 cents and export price of 3.4 cents, quoted for sugar in August this year.

During the period of free raw sugar between 1891 and 1894 the price was reduced 2¾ cents per pound; consumption increased 23 per cent in the first year and 42 per cent during the whole period. A removal of the present duty would eventually result in a reduction of about 2 cents per pound. This would be of incalculable benefit not alone to the consumers but to such interests as canners, preservers, etc.; and it would not only increase their domestic business, but they would also be in a position to greatly increase their exports, thus creating a demand for the fruits and berries of the farmers that now go to waste for lack of a market, and this in turn would increase the demand for glass and tin ware, labels, and boxes. The transportation companies would also share in these enormous benefits.

England imports both fruit and sugar and supplies the world with preserves, while the United States, the greatest fruit-growing country in the world, does not even supply the home market with preserves because of the high price of sugar.

For 124 years the sugar industry of this country has had a right to lay tribute upon every other industry and upon every individual of this Republic who uses sugar, and after 124 years of enjoyment of that bounty we hear the Senator say that it can not stand alone. In the first 75 years of its existence it was an infant; it was too young to have this tariff tax taken from it. Now, in the last half of its existence it is too old to have the tariff tax taken from it. After you have had this industry encouraged by countless millions of money poured into the coffers of the men engaged in this business, you say here that your industry will be destroyed if sugar is placed upon the free list. One hundred and twenty-four years old is this infant that is not now ready to be weaned.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question now?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. JAMES. Certainly.

Mr. RANSDELL. I notice that the Senator is getting away from the platform of the Democratic Party, and is devoting all of his attention, or practically all of it, to the Democratic campaign book. Will the Senator kindly tell us who wrote this article on sugar that he is reading from?

Mr. JAMES. It was written by Democratic authority, with the approval of the Democratic national committee and the Democratic congressional committee.

Mr. RANSDELL. Who wrote it, please?

Mr. JAMES. I do not know who wrote it, but I know it had their approval.

Mr. RANSDELL. I have been told by a member of the national committee that it was slipped into the book without ever being submitted to the committee. Col. Robert Ewing, the national committeeman from Louisiana, is my authority for that statement.

Mr. JAMES. I notice that it has never been repudiated or taken out of the book; and I will say for the Democratic national committee, which the Senator seems to be willing to charge with sending men to double-deal in the West, and now charges with forgery in the Democratic campaign book, that they will repudiate that charge. I undertake to say that the article was not slipped into this campaign book, but it was written there by the authority of the Democratic national committee.

Mr. RANSDELL. It is strange, then, that the Senator can not tell us who wrote it.

Mr. JAMES. How could I tell who wrote all these articles in the Democratic campaign book?

Mr. RANSDELL. I guess it would be pretty hard to tell. Will the Senator let me ask him another question?

Mr. JAMES. Certainly.

Mr. RANSDELL. The Senator says the Louisiana industry is an infant 124 years old.

Mr. JAMES. Yes.

Mr. RANSDELL. Does not the Senator admit that it has been getting a considerable rate of duty during all of those 124 years?

Mr. JAMES. Certainly it has.

Mr. RANSDELL. Does not the Senator admit that a very large sum of money has been invested in the sugar industry by the people of Louisiana, and also by the people of Texas, on the faith of laws that have been on the statute books of this country for 124 years?

Mr. JAMES. I know that sugar was placed upon the free list back in 1890.

Mr. RANSDELL. Was there not a bounty put on it at the same time?

Mr. JAMES. I know they have had notice of the agitation of the sugar question, and I will say to the Senator that no right becomes a vested right because special privilege happens to get it through Congress. You have no right to claim for the people of Louisiana who have been producing sugar a vested right to extort tribute from every other consumer in America to enable them to do a profitable business.

Mr. RANSDELL. Would not the argument of the Senator apply to every article that has been bearing revenue?

Mr. JAMES. Certainly it would not apply to every article that has been bearing revenue.

Mr. RANSDELL. Why not?

Mr. JAMES. Because sugar is an absolute necessity of life.

Mr. RANSDELL. Are not clothes a necessity of life?

Mr. JAMES. Clothes are a necessity of life; certainly they are.

Mr. RANSDELL. Is the Senator in favor of putting wool on the free list?

Mr. JAMES. Certainly I am in favor of putting wool on the free list.

Mr. RANSDELL. Are you in favor of putting clothes on the free list?

Mr. JAMES. No, sir; we are not.

Mr. RANSDELL. Do people wear wool or clothes?

Mr. JAMES. The Senator might go on and ask me a thousand questions about what we are putting on the free list. We are putting sugar on the free list. That is one thing I know.

Mr. RANSDELL. Since the Senator is so solicitous for free sugar, I will ask him if we do not pay a great deal more tribute to trusts and to revenue-producing articles in clothes than we do in sugar?

Mr. JAMES. So far as I am concerned, I should be glad if we could raise sufficient revenue in various ways to give the people free clothes. This we can not do, but we can give them free sugar. Sugar in this country is controlled by a trust, and the Senator knows it; and clothes are not.

Mr. RANSDELL. I will ask the Senator if sugar is not the cheapest article of human food and if its price has not gone steadily down for many years?

Mr. JAMES. Suppose it is the cheapest article of human food—does that give you any right to rob the consumers who want it?

Mr. RANSDELL. The Senator says it is controlled by a trust. Why is it so cheap if it is controlled by a trust?

Mr. JAMES. I should be glad if the Senator would allow me to proceed. He has spoken about four hours upon this matter. The Senator will not deny that sugar is controlled by a trust.

Mr. RANSDELL. To a certain extent it is controlled by a trust, and you are preparing to let it be absolutely controlled by a trust, in cooperation with Mr. Frank C. Lowry. You are trying to make the American people believe that they can get cheap sugar when you make it free.

Mr. JAMES. I will show you another thing in the Democratic platform that applies to that:

Articles entering into competition with trust-controlled products and articles of American manufacture which are sold abroad more cheaply than at home should be put upon the free list.

So, you have gotten on the free list twice with your sugar proposition.

Mr. RANSDELL. Not at all.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me to proceed until I present my reply to his speech, I shall be very glad then to yield to him. I can not possibly yield, however, just to have the Senator enter into a quarrel with me on everything that happens to come into his mind.

Mr. RANSDELL. I do not want to do that, but the Senator has tried to put improper words into my mouth——

Mr. JAMES. Oh, no; the Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. RANSDELL. And I simply want to say that the only hope we have against the Sugar Trust is the competition of the domestic producers of sugar—largely the beet-sugar producers. They certainly are in no trust, and the Louisiana sugar producers are in no trust. But destroy the domestic sugar producers of Louisiana and the West and you will have it all controlled by a trust, and you are playing into the hands of a trust when you put sugar on the free list.

Mr. JAMES. That is like the Senator's statement yesterday, that Mr. Lowry was the agent of the trust. The Senator certainly knows better than that. Mr. Lowry is the agent of the independents that are trying to get free sugar for the American people. [Manifestations of disapproval on the Republican side of the Chamber.] I know I may find some "ah, ha's" upon the other side; I do not doubt that; but the people gave you enough to hold you for awhile last November. [Laughter and applause in the galleries.]

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, this may be entertaining, but I rise to ask that the rules of the Senate may be enforced, and that applause in the galleries may be suppressed. We do not want a town meeting here to-day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair tried to suppress it the other day when the shoe was on the other foot. The Chair will ask the Sergeant at Arms to see that the galleries keep order.

Mr. GALLINGER. No, Mr. President; I take exception to the statement about the shoe being on the other foot. I simply ask that the rules be enforced.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Sergeant at Arms will see that the galleries keep order, or he will clear them.

Mr. JAMES. The Senator's argument is that the word "legitimate" in the Democratic platform, where it says, "we advocate * * * legislation that will not injure or destroy legitimate industry," gives the Louisiana sugar growers the right to maintain this duty. The word "legitimate" is not written into the platform to mean "lawful"—that is, that you shall conduct your business so as not to get in the penitentiary, so as not to violate the criminal laws. The word "legitimate" means industrially legitimate, commercially legitimate. Can the Senator say that an industry in this country is legitimate that has had for 125 years aid from the Government and is not able now to sustain itself?

Mr. President, we may differ about Democratic platforms, but we can not differ about what Thomas Jefferson, the father of Democracy, said about that question:

Taxes on consumption, like those on capital or income, to be just, must be uniform. I do not mean to say that it may not be for the general interest to foster for a while certain infant manufactures until they are strong enough to stand against foreign rivals; but when evident that they will never be so, it is against right to make the other branches of industry support them.

That was Thomas Jefferson. He was the wisest seer of his time. No man before him and no man after him has ever proved himself the philosopher, the benefactor of humanity, that Thomas Jefferson did. His utterance was that it was unjust to impose a tax of that sort, and he further said:

When it was found that France could not make sugar under 6 h. a pound, was it not tyranny to restrain her citizens from importing at 1 h.? Or would it not have been so to have laid a duty of 5 h. on the imported?

That was the position of Mr. Jefferson, when we found we were unable to stand alone, and that we never should be.

The Senator told us here yesterday that sugar could be produced in Cuba for 2 cents a pound, and that it could not be produced in Louisiana for less than 3½ cents, and that if we took off the tariff it meant destruction of their industries.

Mr. President, I do not want to destroy any legitimate industry in this Republic. It has been suggested here that free sugar would dismantle the sugar factories. I do not want to do that. But I rejoice that we have found a President of the United States who is standing in front of and resisting with all his might the dismantling of the humble homes of the people of this Republic. It is always easy to find some one who is willing to stand and defend the big things from being dismantled, while proceeding to dismantle the little ones by unjust taxation. I have read the position of Mr. Jefferson upon that question—it is the position of the Democratic Party.

Mr. President, there was no issue that was submitted to the American people that met with such popular favor as free sugar. Next to sugar, there was no act of the Democratic Congress that met with such favor as the excise-tax bill. Let me show the Senator what the Democratic textbook says upon that question:

RÉSUMÉ OF TARIFF WORK.

The following tabular statement presents a summary of the results of the tariff work in the House of the Sixty-second Congress:

Measure.	Equivalent ad valorem rates.		Estimated saving to consumers.[1]
	Import, 1911.	Democratic bill.
Free list	[2] 18.75	Free.	$390,000,000
Wool (raw, manufactures of)	42.20	20.00	52,000,000
	87.65	42.55
Cotton	47.05	27.06	88,000,000
Metals	34.51	22.42	81,000,000
Chemicals	25.72	16.66	17,000,000
Sugar	53.95	Free.	115,000,000
Total			743,000,000

[1] 12-month period. [2] Import, 1910.

The excise-tax bill would have transferred fifty millions of tax from the poor man's table to the rich man's profit.

Yet the Senator would have us believe that with the Democratic Party going forth before the country and presenting its reasons why it should have the support of the American people, the one schedule that gave to the American people the greatest relief, except that of the free list, was not indorsed by the Democratic national convention.

Mr. President, platforms are a bond of honor. This is a new age. As has been happily said by the President in the White House, it is a new day and a new freedom. When we find our President, who was elected upon this platform, standing like a stone wall, demanding that it shall be carried out, it is no time for other men to falter. The American people are eagerly watching the action of the Democratic Party; they demand that platform promises shall not be betrayed; they ask that the faith shall be kept. Our Republican friends passed the Payne-Aldrich bill; that, in my judgment, was a betrayal of their promise to the American people. If William H. Taft had possessed one-half the courage of Woodrow Wilson, he would have vetoed that bill, and bonfires would have burned in his honor upon every hilltop and in every valley in this Republic, and I have no doubt he would have been reelected President of the United States. But he signed it, and the people called him to account and sent him and his party to overwhelming defeat. We have a President now who writes upon the color lance of the Democratic Party, "No compromise; I am seeking none; I ask none; I want none. I am for free sugar and I am for free wool."

Mr. President, my friend from Louisiana refers to the speech of Secretary Redfield in which he said he did not want to destroy any legitimate industry. But the Senator knew when he was making that speech that Mr. Redfield himself, as a Member of Congress, had voted for the farmers and laborers' free-list bill placing all these various articles upon the free list. The Senator knew that Mr. Redfield had voted for free sugar. How could the Senator believe he was an honest man and construe his language in the light of his conduct by anything else except to say that certain articles which enter into the daily use of all the people of the country—necessaries of life—should be placed upon the free list? That was his act and that was his vote. Anything that he might have said in any statement given to the newspapers after he talked to the President must be construed in the light of his own action.

But the Senator tells us that the President of the United States has never said that he was for free sugar. The Democratic Party makes its platform, and the Democratic Party commissions a committee to go and notify the nominee. That committee bears with it a copy of the national platform. It presents that platform to the nominee and says to him, "Upon this platform we most respectfully ask your acceptance of the nomination." Woodrow Wilson accepted this nomination upon this platform, and he has the courage to stand up to it—every letter of it.

But the Senator says that it was suggested at Baltimore by some one, the Senator does not tell us who, that the President was not antagonistic to a tax upon sugar. That is a rather indefinite statement, because you do not give us the name of anyone who had the authority to speak for him. I say here now, and I challenge contradiction of it, you can not find a human being to whom Woodrow Wilson ever declared he was in favor of a tax upon sugar.

The Senator talks about the speech of the President at Pittsburgh. All of the utterances of the President merely say what the Democratic platform says, that we do not want to destroy any legitimate industry.

Mr. President, the growing of bananas might possibly be accomplished in a slight degree in Vermont, but would anyone say that a tariff tax in order to sustain it would make it a legitimate industry? Not at all.

Mr. RANSDELL. Will the Senator yield for just one question?

Mr. JAMES. Certainly.

Mr. RANSDELL. I ask the Senator if he considers the great sugar industry of the West and the South a legitimate or an illegitimate industry?

Mr. JAMES. Oh, Mr. President, in answer to that statement I will say that I suppose the sugar industry of the South and of the West does not violate the law. I suppose in that way it is legitimate; that is, legally legitimate. But it is not economically legitimate. The Senator himself admits that when he asks to tax the American people in order to let it live.

But let me say to the Senator that you have fertile land in Louisiana. You grow sugar cane there. Your land is more fertile than our blue-grass fields in Kentucky. Our farmers grow corn and wheat. Does the Senator believe that it is right to tax our people in Kentucky, who go out and till the soil just as hard as your people do, and to take from their pockets money in order to make your industry profitable?

Mr. RANSDELL. Will the Senator allow me to answer that question?

Mr. JAMES. Certainly.

Mr. RANSDELL. If you can show any Kentucky industry that has been receiving a rate of duty for 124 years, and an industry which everyone admits will be destroyed if the duty is not continued upon it, like the sugar industry, which the very able Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] yesterday admitted would be completely destroyed, which the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means also admits will be completely destroyed, an industry——

Mr. JAMES. I did not yield for a speech.

Mr. RANSDELL. Let me state the question. An industry in the West, which has grown up in the last 25 years from nothing to producing nearly 650,000 tons of sugar every year, which has grown 1,800 per cent in 25 years, is certainly a legitimate industry. If that kind of an industry in your State is now going to be destroyed, I say I will vote 100 times to continue the duty upon it. Name the industry in your State.

Mr. JAMES. I differ from the Senator in his construction of the term "legitimate industry." In the first place, I stand for the same treatment of a Kentucky interest that I give to other people. The Senator wants a tax on sugar, but is willing to make lumber free. He is willing to make meat and bread free. He is willing to make boots and shoes free. Why do you not accord to other industries in this country the same treatment that you ask for yours? They have not had tariff protection for 124 years.

Mr. RANSDELL. Will it destroy those industries to take off the tax?

Mr. JAMES. They said it would; but you did not pay any attention to it. They all told us it would destroy them, and you and I and BROUSSARD all voted to place them on the free list.

Mr. RANSDELL. Does not the Senator admit that it would destroy the Louisiana industry?

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, it is immaterial from my standpoint what might be the effect upon the Louisiana industry. In the first place, I do not believe it would destroy it. In the second place, the Senator has no right to ask all the American people to continue a tariff 124 years old for any industry which, during all these years, is not able to supply the domestic demand nor practically more than 25 per cent of it.

Mr. RANSDELL. Do you think you know better about the effect on this industry than the Senator from Mississippi or the gentleman at the head of the Ways and Means Committee?

Mr. JAMES. I do not care to draw any invidious comparison between my opinion and the opinion of the Senator from Mississippi, or between what I think and what the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House thinks. I think they are both splendid Democrats and their opinions are entitled to great respect.

Mr. RANSDELL. You ask about my vote on the other matters. Do you think it would destroy the lumber industry of this country to place lumber on the free list?

Mr. JAMES. Certainly I do not.

Mr. RANSDELL. Do you think it would destroy these other articles to place them on the free list?

Mr. JAMES. You have no right to ram your hand into the people's Treasury in order to maintain an industry that can not stand upon its own legs after it has had 124 years' trial.

Mr. RANSDELL. Then, why do you not put everything on the free list? Put them all on the free list, and I will vote for free sugar.

Mr. JAMES. The Senator surely would not do that, because the Senator told us with great solemnity yesterday that he had given a promise to the people of Louisiana that under no condition would he betray them—that he never would vote for reduction of duty on sugar—and surely the Senator would not vote for free sugar. You must retract that statement made in the heat and anger of the moment. The Senator will want to take it out of the RECORD.

Mr. RANSDELL. Never will I want to take it out.

Mr. JAMES. I ask that I may proceed.

Mr. RANSDELL. I make the statement with the understanding that if you will take the tariff duty from everything my people have to buy, from all the implements and all the clothing and everything they buy and put them on the free list, we will stand for free sugar, though I do not wish to be understood as advocating any such proposition as that.

Mr. JAMES. That is, if they will do the impossible thing, the thing that can not be done, a thing that you know will not be done, you will do the thing you know now you will never be called upon to do.

Mr. RANSDELL. Why do you single out sugar for slaughter and provide for a duty on other things?

Mr. JAMES. I have answered that four or five times. We are placing various things on the free list.

I wish to say in conclusion, Mr. President, that what I have said to the Senator here, the utterances I have given, have not been in anger. They have been rather according to that Biblical statement, "Whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth." [Laughter.] I have not meant to be harsh. I have meant only to be emphatic.

I stand, Mr. President, for free sugar and for free wool. I am earnestly in favor of carrying out the letter and spirit of our national platform. I am prepared to uphold the hands of Woodrow Wilson, the greatest President we have had in this Republic in 50 years, and, in my judgment, one who has the American people back of him this hour as no man has had since the days of Andrew Jackson.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair desires to state to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] that the Chair was out of order a little while ago and hopes the Senator will understand that it was not intended to be unparliamentary nor personal to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; if the Chair will permit me, I certainly have the profoundest respect for the Chair, and I will not say anything or intimate anything to the contrary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair felt it his duty to the Senator from New Hampshire to make this statement.

Mr. NORRIS obtained the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me one moment?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. In view of what has occurred during the past two days, I want to read three lines from The Rivals. Sir Lucius O'Trigger is a famous character in the play, and he said:

> Pray, sir, be easy; the quarrel is a very pretty quarrel as it stands; we should only spoil it by trying to explain it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, about a year ago the Department of Justice began a suit entitled the United States against Herman Sielcken and others, in the United States district court in the city of New York. The object of the suit was in reality to bring about the breaking up of a great international trust that had gained control of the sale and the distribution of coffee throughout the entire world. Soon after the administration changed the suit was dismissed. I introduced a resolution in the Senate calling upon the Attorney General for certain information and certain documents in relation to the dismissal of that suit. That resolution was passed, and the Attorney General has made his reply.

Before I proceed to comment upon that reply I want briefly to review the situation in regard to the so-called valorization of coffee. In 1906 Sao Paulo, one of the States of the Brazilian Government, undertook to purchase coffee upon the markets of the world and take it out of the commerce and trade of the world, with the view of controlling the price. Bonds to the amount of $15,000,000 were issued and taken by various bankers in Europe and in America. One-third of the amount was taken, I believe, by the National City Bank of New York. After this scheme had been undertaken it was discovered that the magnitude of the undertaking was too great, and with the amount of money that they had realized from the sale of these bonds they were going to be unable to successfully carry out the plan. In the year 1908 another plan was agreed upon by which $75,000,000 of bonds were issued by the State and placed upon the markets of the world.

The defendant in the suit about which I expect to talk a little later, Herman Sielcken, was the great master mind that brought about the successful operation of this great international trust. These bonds were issued by the State of Sao Paulo. They were guaranteed by the Brazilian Government, and laws were passed prohibiting the planting of coffee trees in Brazil. A surtax was levied upon the exportation of coffee from Brazil, and a general agreement was entered into between the men who had charge of these bonds and the Brazilian Government in order to be able to carry out the object of controlling the world's market price in coffee.

Mr. President, in addition to the security of this State and the guaranty of the Brazilian Government and the surtax that was levied by the Brazilian Government upon the exportation of coffee, the coffee itself that was purchased with this money was put up as security for the payment of the bonds.

On the 26th of April, 1911, in the House of Representatives, I went into detail and showed fully the names of all the men who furnished the money, the proportion of the bonds which they took, and all the details of the agreement. At this time I only want to review it briefly, in order to explain what I want to say in regard to this particular suit. I showed at that time that this combination, this international trust, had been successful, and that during the time they were in operation, up to the day I made those remarks in the House, the price of coffee had more than doubled; that from the time of the second arrangement the price of coffee had been steadily advancing step by step until the price had more than doubled.

I might say, by the way, that I explained there what I believed to be the duty of the Department of Justice, and called attention to what I believed to be a violation of law by the men who were engaged in this gigantic scheme that laid them liable both to a civil and a criminal prosecution under the laws as they existed, chiefly the Sherman antitrust law.

But later on I introduced a bill that during the last session of Congress was enacted into law. It was an amendment of sections 73 and 76 of the act of August 27, 1894, which I believe more completely declared the legislative opinion as to the illegality of this kind of a trust than had existed before. And at this point, Mr. President, I will ask the Secretary to read sections 73 and 76, as they were amended by the bill I introduced in the last Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 73. That every combination, conspiracy, trust, agreement, or contract is hereby declared to be contrary to public policy, illegal, and void when the same is made by or between two or more persons or corporations either of whom, as agent or principal, is engaged in importing any article from any foreign country into the United States, and when such combination, conspiracy, trust, agreement, or contract is intended to operate in restraint of lawful trade, or free competition in lawful trade or commerce, or to increase the market price in any part of the United States of any article or articles imported or intended to be imported into the United States, or of any manufacture into which such imported article enters or is intended to enter. Every person who is or shall hereafter be engaged in the importation of goods or any commodity from any foreign country in violation of this section of this act, or who shall combine or conspire with another to violate the same, is guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof in any court of the United States such person shall be fined in a sum not less than $100 and not exceeding $5,000, and shall be further punished by imprisonment, in the discretion of the court, for a term not less than 3 months nor exceeding 12 months.

SEC. 76. That any property owned under any contract or by any combination, or pursuant to any conspiracy, and being the subject thereof, mentioned in section 73 of this act, imported into and being within the United States or being in the course of transportation from one State to another, or to or from a Territory or the District of Columbia, shall be forfeited to the United States, and may be seized and condemned by like proceedings as those provided by law for the forfeiture, seizure, and condemnation of property imported into the United States contrary to law.

Approved, February 12, 1913.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, my own judgment is, from the investigation that I have been able to make—and I will show before I get through that that judgment was concurred in by the Department of Justice—that the men who were engaged in this gigantic plan to corner the coffee of the world, the men who furnished the money, as well as the men who furnished the brains to concoct the scheme, were all equally liable. I concede, speaking in reference to these bonds now, that bonds secured as these were, if placed upon the market and sold in the ordinary course of business, would carry with them no imputation of dishonesty or dishonor to any man who furnished the money to buy them.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to his colleague?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I did not fully understand by whom these bonds were issued.

Mr. NORRIS. I will repeat it as soon as I finish this statement.

In this particular case, however, before these bonds were issued, before any money was put up, the men who furnished the money, the men who were instrumental in bringing about the scheme or plan, knew in advance and demanded in advance—

First. That the bonds should be issued by the State of Sao Paulo.

Second. That they should be guaranteed by the Brazilian Government.

Third. That the Government continue in force laws that should prohibit the planting of coffee trees in order to curtail the future output.

Fourth. That thhe Government should pass a law providing for the collection of a surtax on every bag of coffee shipped out of Brazil, this tax to be remitted weekly to the bondholders' committee and to be applied in the payment of expenses and interest on the loan.

Fifth. That the bonds should draw 5 per cent interest and should be given to the men who furnished the money at 85 cents on the dollar.

Sixth. That in case the surtax and the limiting of the planting of trees should not sufficiently limit the future production, that an additional ad valorem tax should be levied on all coffee exported above a certain number of bags stipulated in the agreement.

Seventh. That the proceeds of the bonds, after paying expenses and discounts, and so forth, should be used for the purchase of coffee on the market, and that the coffee so purchased should be taken out of the ordinary channels of trade and held as further security for the loan.

Eighth. That the sale of this coffee so purchased should be under the control of a committee of seven, one member of such committee to be selected by the American bankers, one to be selected by each of the five European bankers, and the seventh by the Government of Sao Paulo.

Afterwards, when the scheme was completed and carried out, Herman Sielcken was selected as the American member of this managing committee and is still serving in that capacity.

These men knew in advance, before a dollar was furnished, the details of the scheme, the intention of which must necessarily have been to increase to the consumers of coffee the amount they would have to pay for it, to interfere with and restrain trade in coffee between this country and Brazil.

We are the largest consumers of coffee in the world. In some of the documents that I shall ask to have printed in the RECORD it will appear that we consume from 40 to 50 per cent of the world's production of coffee and that we get from Brazil about 80 per cent of the coffee which she produces.

The man who did the most in negotiating the deal was Herman Sielcken, the defendant in this suit. He was assisted at all times in his subsequent action in trying, first, to prevent legislation by Congress, and second, in trying to prevent the Department of Justice from enforcing the laws of Congress, by the representatives of the Brazilian Government.

Mr. President, I believe it must be conceded that when a sovereign government, one of the great governments of the civilized world, leaves its proper sphere, comes down into the marts of trade, and buys and sells and traffics in articles of produce that are bought and sold upon the market, it leaves behind it its sovereign character and subjects itself to the same laws and the same rules and regulations that every individual who trades in the markets subjects himself to.

When the bill I have mentioned was pending in Congress we find Mr. Sielcken doing everything he can to prevent the enactment of the bill into law. Under his influence the coffee men who have been favored by him, and perhaps some of the coffee men who are afraid of him, held a meeting in New York and passed resolutions condemning it. Mr. Sielcken himself, from his palatial home in Europe, cabled an interview to the American press in which he held the law up to ridicule, claiming that it was of no effect, could not be enforced, meant nothing, and would amount to nothing. While this was going on, however, before the public and in the newspapers a different procedure was being enacted behind the scenes in the State Department. There efforts were being made not only to prevent the passage of the bill, but to prevent the enforcement of the law after it had been passed and to bring about the dismissal of this suit against Sielcken. There it was given the most serious consideration, and it was claimed that unless this concession was made to this valorization scheme and the laws of our country not enforced as against this international trust that the Brazilian Government would take retaliatory measures and withdraw some of the concessions she had been in the habit of making to some of the products of this country that are imported into Brazil. The Brazilian Government had been enjoying particular favors in tariff concessions from our country. Over 99 per cent of everything she produces is admitted to the ports of the United States free of duty. To partially repay this liberal concession Brazil had given some tariff concessions to this Government on flour and a few other articles. So while the emissaries representing the financial end of the scheme were trying to control congressional action through newspaper publicity the Brazilian Government was trying to do the same thing through the State Department, mildly threatening a tariff war against the products of the United States.

I found not very long ago in a great many newspapers in the United States something similar to this. I have a large number of them from leading newspapers in the United States. I will only read this one. The statement is substantially the same in every newspaper, though in different language, the idea always being the same:

UNITED STATES LOSES BRAZIL'S TRADE—LOSS OF $3,000,000 ANNUAL BUSINESS DUE TO COFFEE SCHEME BAN.

The $3,000,000 annual flour trade of American millers with Brazil, as well as a lucrative business in cement, typewriters, certain classes of machinery, and other American products, probably has been finally lost, owing to the resentment of the Brazilian Government at the breaking up of the coffee valorization scheme by the Department of Justice.

The Brazilian ambassador, Señor Da Gama, has had several conferences with State Department officials, and has now let it be known that his Government will decline to extend hereafter the differential of 30 per cent in customs dues on those American products. In consequence the Argentine millers will early command the Brazilian market.

As I say, this dispatch, or the substance of this dispatch, appeared in all the leading daily papers of the country. Brazil proceeded to carry out its threat, and I understand has withdrawn some of the advantages that heretofore existed in regard to the importation into that country from this of some American products, notably flour.

Mr. President, I believe and I hold that, even though Brazil were able seriously to interfere with our foreign commerce and our foreign trade, we could not, with that kind of a veiled threat, refuse or neglect to enforce our laws against Brazil and these international bankers who are engaged in this so-called valorization of coffee. We can not afford to do this, because it is not fair or right that Brazil should ask it. She can not honorably ask for herself and for Mr. Sielcken and his moneyed associates any concession or any favor that our laws do not give to our own citizens. We can not honorably submit to it, even though a refusal to do so would mean the loss of all our foreign trade. She can not honestly ask it; we can not honorably agree to it.

In addition to that, there is another reason why we should not submit, which ought to appeal to those who take only a selfish view of the situation. Brazil is living in a glass house. The American people, by the consumption of coffee, have made it possible for this gigantic scheme to succeed. If the American people would cease to use coffee for three months, the Brazilian Government, these international bankers, and Herman Sielcken, the defendant in this suit, would be on their knees begging for mercy.

Mr. President, that gigantic scheme is sometimes said to have been intended for the benefit of the Brazilian coffee planter. I would not find fault, and I do not believe anyone would have a right to find fault, with the Brazilian Government if it does anything that it can honestly and fairly do for the benefit of any of its citizens; but let us see how much this gigantic scheme has cost and who profits by it.

Before a dollar was taken, before the loan was made, it was agreed by this committee and the officials of that State in Brazil—the Brazilian officials—that these bonds should be taken at 85 cents on the dollar. The bonds draw 5 per cent interest, and, counting the time they have to run, the interest rate would amount to about 9 per cent. Mr. Sielcken, in his testimony before one of the committees of the House of Representatives some time ago, admitted that these were the best secured bonds that he had ever had anything to do with—in fact, they were drawing 9 per cent interest. They were secured by the guaranty of a State of Brazil that has never repudiated or failed to pay a dollar of her debt; they were guaranteed by the Brazilian Government; and then the coffee bought with the money or with the money that was left after the fellows in the scheme took what belonged to them—the balance was invested in coffee, and that was put up as security. That coffee was kept in different warehouses in various parts of the world. Then the Brazilian Government levied a tax of 5 francs on every bag of coffee that went out from Brazil, and that money was remitted to this bankers' committee, who used it to pay the expenses and to pay the interest on the bonds. The Brazilian Government then by law provided a heavy tax on the planting of coffee trees in Brazil. So we really have the same situation as though the great State of New York would issue $75,000,000 of bonds, invest the proceeds in something that was produced almost entirely within the limits of New York, then would sell bonds at 85 cents on the dollar, invest the money in that product, whatever it might be, put it up as security, and then, to prevent an overproduction, later pass a law that would limit the production, and then, in addition to it all, the United States Government would guarantee the bonds.

A report was made by one of the officials of the Brazilian Government showing the expense up to the 30th day of September, 1910. As I have said, there was a discount of about $11,000,000 to begin with:

The payment of storage, freight, fire and marine insurance, interest on drafts against shipments, interest on advances in account current, commissions for opening credits, various expenses connected with the storage of the coffee, interest on loans, difference in "type" of loans, difference in exchange on drafts against shipments—amounted to over $50,000,000 up to that time.

So that after all the poor coffee-tree planter in Brazil, who in the end has to pay the bonds and the interest, is not going to profit very much by this proposition. When this coffee was bought Mr. Sielcken, through his firm of Crossman & Sielcken, assisted in purchasing the coffee with the money that was realized from the sale of these bonds. Sielcken, representing the bankers, purchased a part of the coffee that was bought with this money from Sielcken himself or from his firm. His own testimony shows that later on he bought some of the valorized coffee when it was put on the market; in other words, as the agent for the bankers' committee he sold to himself and then he sold it to the trade at a profit. So we have the peculiar condition, so far as this man is concerned, of first representing the Brazilian Government, taking this money and buying coffee from himself for the valorization committee; and then, as representing the committee, selling to himself and then selling the same coffee to the trade. It is presumed he made a profit when, as the owner of the coffee, he sold it to himself as a member of the committee. Then, as a member of the valorization committee, he received a commission when he sold it to himself; and then, as a member of his firm, he made another profit when he sold it to the trade.

The agreement provided that this committee should get 1 per cent upon all the coffee they sold. Under the agreement they also provided themselves with an office in the city of London and paid for the employment of clerks and other necessary expenses, discounts and all amounting, as I have said, to over $50,000,000. The expenses connected with the first loan of $15,000,000—a scheme that Mr. Sielcken negotiated and worked out through his own master mind—amounted to 24 per cent of the amount of the loan. So that of these bonds, the best secured bonds and drawing the highest rate of interest, in my judgment, of any bonds that ever have been issued in the civilized world, the great bulk of them we find going in the shape of expenses, discounts, and profits to the men who concocted the scheme and who carried out the plan.

Now, let us see how they could handle the coffee trade of the world, and particularly of the United States, by holding out from the markets of trade this immense quantity of coffee. The dealers in coffee in New York and throughout this country who did not "stand in" with Hermann Sielcken did not know and never did know what was going to happen the next day to the coffee market. I have here the New York Journal of Commerce of March 31, 1911, where it gives the course that was pursued in Europe when they sold valorized coffee, and compares it with the proceeding that took place in the United States when valorized coffee was sold. I read from it:

The New York coffee trade, except those who will be unduly favored by this remarkable condition of affairs, are disgusted at the proceedings. Trade has recently been completely disorganized, and some important members of the trade believe that an open and fair coffee market can not exist until the entire stock of valorized coffee has been sold. Representatives of the Government have recently been interviewing members of the coffee trade in this city, collecting data for an investigation of the Coffee Trust.

Then it goes on to say that when valorized coffee was sold in Europe it was sold at public sale. Any man who wanted to bid on it had the right and the privilege of doing so, and notice was given to him by public advertisement to go to the place where samples were kept and examine samples of the coffee, so that they bid with their eyes open. Every man had a right to bid as he saw fit.

In New York, when the valorized coffee was sold in this country, it was sold in secret. It was sold, as the evidence discloses, often—always, I think—with an agreement that it should not be reoffered for sale on the coffee exchange.

This article goes on to show that such has always been the case in the sale of valorized coffee. So that unless men understood just what was going to be done with the amount of coffee that might be placed upon the market by this committee represented by Mr. Sielcken, they had no way of knowing whether coffee was going up or whether it was going down. They knew that this syndicate held in their own hands millions and millions of bags of coffee that they could, if they so desired, secretly sell among their friends—that, in reality, would mean no sale. They had, in effect, control of the market. They made what are known in the trade as restricted sales.

I find, among the papers sent up, a memorandum made by one of the agents of the Government in regard to these sales:

With regard to "restricted sales," Burroughs told me that Crossman & Sielcken, 90 Wall Street, representing the bankers' committee, and through them the Brazilian Government, and Arbuckle Bros.—the two principal offenders.

The "offenders" are the men who sell at restricted sales.

By "restricted sales" are meant, to quote from an article in to-day's Journal of Commerce—and which are, in fact, Burroughs's own words—those which, by formal contract, or gentlemen's agreement, or other subterfuge, are made below the market price, on condition that the coffee shall not be delivered on contracts on the exchange. In other words, the plan is to create an artificial shortage, so far as coffee deliverable on the exchange is concerned, and thus prevent the full supplies of coffee available in this country from becoming a factor in the official New York price for coffee.

There is not any doubt but that these sales were in reality made in secret.

When we remember that an increase of 1 cent a pound on coffee means $10,000,000 from the coffee consumers of the United States, we can realize what this gigantic scheme amounts to.

Mr. Sielcken's defense of the matter is that he was desirous of encouraging trade between the United States and Brazil; he was desirous of bringing the two countries on a more friendly basis. He had no thought, he said, of increasing the price of coffee to the consumer; and he even denied that the valorization plan would tend to increase the price of coffee. Yet in the midst of it all the Brazilian records show, in an official report made in Brazil, comparing the prices of coffee before the beginning of the scheme and afterwards, the true result.

The official making the report compares the prices of coffee for four years preceding valorization and the prices for four years afterwards. During the first four years of the valorization scheme the production of the world's coffee attained its highest point. The largest world's product of coffee was during one of those years. He goes on in this report to say:

There is no foundation whatsoever to the suggestion which has sometimes been made that the benefits which followed the Government's action were due simply to natural causes and were not in any way influenced by such action. What happened was just the contrary, and it may be easily verified by examining the figures for the crops of four years preceding and four years succeeding the intervention.

Then the official goes on to show what the crops were. He shows that for the four years preceding the so-called valorization the average yearly production of the world's coffee was 15,574,000 bags, and that for the four years following the commencement of the valorization scheme the average world's production of coffee was 18,418,000 bags, showing that while the production of coffee was increasing at an enormous rate the price of coffee was going up, and in the meantime had doubled. While an overproduction was going on the consumers of coffee were required to pay twice the amount they paid before for their coffee.

As I have said, Mr. President, the master mind that has done all this, more than any other one mind, is that of Hermann Sielcken; and his defense is that he was really a philanthropist trying to be good to people that he was punishing.

Mr. President, I believe every man is responsible to his Creator for the talents that have been given him. If he possesses wisdom, if he possesses wealth, if he possesses power, he is and ought to be held accountable by humanity for its use. The man who has more wealth than he can possibly use himself and more than can possibly be enjoyed by those who are dependent upon him and who uses that wealth to oppress the poor or to increase the hardship of those who toil has, in my judgment, committed a greater sin in the eyes of God than any offense that can be committed against any man-made law.

If you are suffering with hunger and some man steals your dinner, it will not appease your appetite to be afterwards informed that he stole it because he loved you, or because he thought it would not be good for you to eat it; and it will not increase your respect for his love and his philanthropy if you afterwards learn that after he stole it from you he sold it at exorbitant figures to some other hungry mortal.

I have some little respect for the bold highwayman who, in broad daylight, on the public highway, holds you up and takes your purse, but I have no respect for the man already reeking with wealth who stands at the doorway of every humble home and with itching palm outstretched compels unwilling tribute in pennies from millions of God's poor.

Mr. President, while this bill I have mentioned was pending in Congress and before it was passed Mr. Wickersham, the then Attorney General, commenced suit against Herman Sielcken and others, the object of which was to compel the sale upon the open market of something over 900,000 bags of coffee that this committee then had in store in the city of New York. He commenced that suit before we had passed the law that has been read in your hearing.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. NORRIS. I will.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I wanted to get in my mind all the material facts that underlie this matter. Do I understand that originally the coffee planters themselves incurred the obligation represented by these bonds, and that the State of Sao Paulo guaranteed their obligations, and then the Brazilian General Government in addition guaranteed them?

Mr. NORRIS. No; the Senator does not have it quite right. The bonds were regularly issued by the State of Sao Paulo.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Without the original obligation coming from the coffee planters?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. They were regular Government State bonds, issued by that State.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Then who owned the coffee that was sequestered to secure the bonds? Did the Brazilian Government buy that and turn it over to the bondholders or does it belong to the coffee planters? That is the only other question I wanted to ask.

Mr. NORRIS. I will make it plain to the Senator. They entered into an agreement with the Government, and the agreement provided that this entire scheme should be under the control of a committee of seven. The American member of that committee is Herman Sielcken, the defendant in this suit, and the other members of the committee represent the other six Governments where money was furnished. Our bankers here, the National City Bank of New York and the First National Bank of New York, represented by Mr. Sielcken, furnished ten millions of these seventy-five millions of dollars. The agreement provided that there should be a committee of one from each of these financial institutions and that the Government of Brazil should appoint another member, making seven, and that this committee of seven should have control of the coffee—control of its sale, its storage, and so forth—under certain stipulations and limitations that were contained in the agreement.

The coffee was bought, then, by this committee. The coffee, whenever they decided to sell any of it, was sold through this committee. At one time, when there was just a little fear that the production might continue to increase, the committee seriously considered the proposition, and consent was given by the Government to take into the ocean coffee from Brazil and sink it into the sea. At another time they proposed that they would burn one-tenth of the coffee in order to prevent an overproduction, in order to make good the price of coffee, which would make good these bonds and make sure the repayment of the money that had been given for the bonds by the different bankers.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Did they ever actually do that?

Mr. NORRIS. They never actually did that. They did, however, provide—and the agreement provided that it should be done—that this surtax should be levied upon all coffee exported from Brazil, and that that should be remitted weekly to this committee to pay their expenses, and to pay interest, and so forth. They provided also, in order to guard against any future big crop of Brazil, that beyond a certain amount of exportation of coffee in every year a heavy export tax should be levied, running up as high as 20 per cent, in order to prevent and discourage the larger production of coffee.

I believe, when the Senator interrupted me, I was just ready to speak of this particular suit which the Attorney General had commenced.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I did not want to divert the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. No; the Senator's question was enlightening, and I am glad he interrupted me.

The Attorney General began this suit on the theory that under the broad equity powers of the court, after he had alleged in substance these facts that I have given, he would be entitled to an order of the court compelling a sale of that coffee. He asked for a restraining order which, in effect, would restrain the dock company—the company that had the coffee actually in its possession in storage—from permitting it to go out of the jurisdiction of the court.

This preliminary injunction was denied by the court, and I believe rightly. I can not help but believe that the Attorney General expected it would be denied, because there was no assurance—there was no belief, in fact—that the coffee was going to be taken out of the jurisdiction of the court. The real object of the suit was to compel its sale.

While that suit was pending negotiations sprang up between the attorneys in the suit, and the Attorney General agreed that he would dismiss the suit if they would make a bona fide sale of the coffee. They agreed to do this, and claimed that they had done it; but the Attorney General, not being satisfied with the bona fides of the sale, refused to dismiss the suit.

Now, I want to give you, from some of the papers that have been sent up here by the Attorney General, some things that have a direct bearing not only upon this particular suit, but upon the question of valorization in general.

June 3, 1912, after this suit had been commenced, the Attorney General wrote a letter to the President, in which he cited his authority for the suit and told the President, in substance, all the details of the suit. I ask, without reading, to have that letter printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there is no objection, that will be done.

[The letter appears at the end of Mr. NORRIS's speech.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Nebraska suspend for just one moment? The morning hour having expired, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate resolution 37; and in accordance with the unanimous-consent agreement the unfinished business is now temporarily laid aside until the disposition of the motion to refer House bill 3321. The Senator from Nebraska will proceed.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, September 16, from New York City, Attorney General Wickersham wrote a letter to the Secretary of State. It might be well for you to note that all the time negotiations, through the representatives of the Brazilian Government, were taking place in the Department of State with reference to this suit and with reference to the enforcement of any law against this valorized coffee. In this letter the Attorney General says:

42 WEST FORTY-FOURTH STREET,
New York, September 16, 1912.

The honorable the SECRETARY OF STATE.

SIR: Your letter of September 5 is just received by me, owing to my absence for a fortnight past in the White Mountains. It is rather significant that the interview reported to you by telegram, received at the department on the 4th instant, between the Brazilian minister for foreign affairs and the American ambassador to Brazil, should have been almost coincident with the receipt at the department of a letter from Mr. Crammond Kennedy, the attorney for Mr. Hermann Sielcken, in which that gentleman informs me that an adjustment which I had supposed had been practically arranged with Mr. Sielcken can not be carried out. At Mr. Kennedy's request I had agreed to delay any further proceedings in the case until his return to this country in September, in order that Mr. Sielcken might have the opportunity to lay my final offer in response to his overtures of settlement before his associates. Mr. Kennedy now informs me that the Brazilians are unwilling to enter into the arrangement suggested, and he argues at some length that to continue the prosecution would endanger the good relations existing between the United States of Brazil and the United States of America.

In the opinion of this department the valorization scheme, in so far as it has been carried out in this country, has involved a willful and deliberate violation of the laws of this country and has resulted in doubling the price to our citizens of a commodity of common use, and has subjected all concerned in this country to prosecution under our laws. Mr. Sielcken has filed a demurrer to the petition brought by the Government under the Sherman Act, and it may be desirable to try out that demurrer in order to allow the court to pass upon the legal question arising upon the facts presented. If, however, as a matter of international policy it should be deemed better not to push that suit, the department is prepared to submit the facts in the case to a grand jury, and I have no doubt that the indictment of Mr. Sielcken, and possibly some others, would follow. I can not well deal with this question fully until my return to Washington, when I shall hope to confer with the Secretary of State about it. Meantime I am advising Mr. Kennedy of my regret at the attitude taken by his clients and my entire unwillingness to enter into any agreement with him which involves a recognition in the slightest degree of either the legality or the propriety of the valorization plan or the acts done pursuant to it.

Very respectfully,

GEORGE W. WICKERSHAM,
Attorney General.

I think, Mr. President, we can very well conclude from the correspondence of the Attorney General, both from this letter and others, particularly the one that I have had printed in the RECORD, that continually there were representations made to him through the State Department, and that the representatives of the Brazilian Government, perhaps through our State Department, had taken it up with the President of the United States and that the President had conferred with the Attorney General in regard to it. Here is a letter from the Attorney General of November 6, 1912, to the United States attorney in New York who had personal charge of the case:

NOVEMBER 6, 1912.

UNITED STATES ATTORNEY, New York, N. Y.

SIR: I have your favor of 25th ultimo about the case of United States v. Sielcken and others. I have also a letter from the State Department making some suggestions regarding the disposition of the matter which have come from the Brazilian ambassador, and which will require some conference with the State Department before I can determine the attitude which this department should assume toward the suggestion made. Under these circumstances—

He goes on then to ask him not to take up the case until he hears from him again. It is safe to assume that he had further correspondence and that he had interviews with the President in regard to it, and that he was laboring particularly in the letter which I have had printed in the RECORD to have the President understand what kind of a case he had, and that he was interceding with the President to induce him, if he could, not to demand that this suit be withdrawn or that it be dismissed. So it is not surprising that a little later——

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me an interruption? It comes in here.

Mr. NORRIS. I will.

Mr. NELSON. I simply desire to say that my recollection is that the bill the Senator referred to at the outset was reported by me from the Judiciary Committee, and that we had a letter before that committee from Mr. Wickersham recommending the passage of the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. He was very earnest for this legislation. I think he ought to receive credit for it.

Mr. NORRIS. I am going to give him credit for it. Mr. President, I am very glad that the Senator interrupted me; I might have forgotten it. I will take this occasion to say that no man did more than Attorney General Wickersham, in my judgment, not only to amend the law in order to make it stronger, but to do his full and complete duty in this case and in fighting the great scheme of valorization. He did it no doubt under circumstances that were harassing. I know he did everything he could after the bill had passed the House, when it was before the Senate committee, to induce the committee to give it consideration and to induce the Senate to pass it.

Now, a little later, November 22, 1912, I find this letter was written to the Attorney General:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, November 22, 1912.

Hon. GEORGE W. WICKERSHAM,
Attorney General.

MY DEAR MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL: I send you herewith a note from a friend of mine, named Schmidlapp, who knows Sielcken. The language of Sielcken is such as to indicate that he is not telling the truth; but I refer it to you for such comment as you wish to make.

Sincerely, yours,

WM. H. TAFT.

In answer to that letter, under date of November 25, 1912, the Attorney General writes as follows:

NOVEMBER 25, 1912.

The PRESIDENT, the White House.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I have yours of 22d instant, inclosing a letter addressed to you by Mr. Schmidlapp, who incloses one to him by Mr. Sielcken, a defendant in the coffee valorization suit.

His statement of what the assistant in charge of this case has said, I believe to be absolutely untrue. In the second place, the statements about the suit are silly, because it was brought only after a most careful and thorough investigation of the whole subject; and his statement of what the court said in denying the motion for an injunction is also wide of the facts. The whole difficulty of the case is that Sielcken has been shielding himself behind the Brazilian Government; and the only reason why I have not brought on for argument the demurrer to the petition filed in New York is because of the pendency of negotiations opened on behalf of the Brazilian Government or Sielcken—I am not quite sure which, because made by the attorney who represents both of them—to do voluntarily precisely all that this equity suit can accomplish, namely, to compel the sale in New York, free and clear of all restrictions, of some 900,000 bags of coffee now stored there, subject to the control of the valorization syndicate. My own firm belief is that Sielcken ought to be indicted, and that he would be convicted of a violation of the Sherman law if the facts were related before a jury; but in view of the relation of the Brazilian Government to the matter I have yielded to the wishes of the State Department to avoid further public discussion of the matter, provided a satisfactory result can be reached. The operations of this syndicate have already extracted more than $10,000,000 of unlawful profit from the pockets of American consumers of coffee. But that is gone. What I am trying to do now is to prevent further acts which would levy an additional toll of the same kind on the remaining undisposed-of coffee.

A few days since Mr. Crammond Kennedy, who is counsel for both the Brazilian Government and Sielcken, stated to me that he could satisfy me that the entire amount of 920,000 bags would be sold probably before the 1st of January, and he asked me to dismiss the suit on the assurance that this would be done. I told him that if I had satisfactory assurance that it would be done, I would be willing to dismiss the suit, making at the same time a public statement of the reasons for so doing. He objected to this statement being made now. I then told him that when the coffee was sold and I was satisfied of that fact, I would dismiss the suit, at that time making a statement of the reasons for so doing. He went away to consider which of the two courses he would prefer to have adopted, and in the meantime I am withholding any further proceeding in the civil suit, although I have a brief ready for the argument of the demurrer, and I am entirely satisfied that the Government has a perfectly good case. I have collected additional evidence regarding Mr. Sielcken's relation to the subject which strengthens the opinion which I expressed concerning his liability for violation of the statute.

I return the correspondence you sent me.

Faithfully, yours;

GEORGE W. WICKERSHAM,
Attorney General.

Mr. NELSON. That was in November?

Mr. NORRIS. It was in November, 1912.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The one just read?

Mr. NORRIS. November 25, 1912.

Mr. President, that gives the Senate an idea not only from my statement of the facts from the investigation that I have made, but from the investigations made by the Attorney General and the Department of Justice, as to what kind of a scheme this was and what kind of a case the Attorney General had. I was very much surprised not many days ago to learn that this case had been dismissed—or I was surprised a few days before that to learn that it was going to be dismissed.

It was claimed that this coffee was sold, and they asked the Department of Justice, under the present Attorney General, to dismiss it in accordance with the agreement made with Attorney General Wickersham that it would be dismissed if the coffee was sold. The question arose at once, Has the coffee been sold? The Attorney General dismissed the suit, and at the time of doing it he issued this public statement. This is from Attorney General McReynolds——

Mr. CRAWFORD. What is the date?

Mr. NORRIS April 16, 1913.

The Government's action in the so-called "valorization coffee suit" was brought to cause the speedy marketing of 920,000 bags of coffee withheld from the market and the ordinary channels of trade in New York warehouses in the hands of Mr. Herman Sielcken, the American member of the valorization committee. The coffee was a part of the security for a loan made by the State of Sao Paulo, guaranteed by the Republic of Brazil. Negotiations through our State Department were entered into looking to the amicable adjustment of the matter. An understanding was reached December 1 last that if the entire 920,000 bags of coffee then in New York were disposed of to bona fide purchasers in the regular course of trade by April 1 this suit would be dismissed.

Now, that far I think the present Attorney General stated the facts correctly. Then he goes on:

Good faith assurances have been presented by the Brazilian Government that the understanding was fulfilled in letter and spirit before the date set, and the entire amount of coffee disposed of to 80 dealers in 33 cities of 20 States. These assurances are accepted, and the suit will be dismissed accordingly.

It is apparent that the disposal of the coffee as represented fulfils the province of the Government's action.

The department asked whether any further steps are contemplated declined to say.

Statement authorized by Attorney General.

I did not believe, Mr. President, that a bona fide sale had been made, and I did not believe it because I was unable to ascertain, and so far as I was able to find out nobody else was able to ascertain, who bought this coffee if it ever was sold. So I introduced Senate resolution No. 58, and at this point I desire the Secretary to read that resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Attorney General be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the Senate the following information:

First. Copies of any and all requests asking for the dismissal of the case of The United States of America, petitioner, v. Herman Sielcken and others, defendants, heretofore pending in the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York.

Second. Copies of any and all agreements that were made by the parties to said action during its pendency, providing for its discontinuance or its dismissal.

Third. Copies of any and all correspondence regarding the maintenance or dismissal of said action.

Fourth. Copies of any and all reports that were made by any agent or special attorney of the Government investigating the existence of any trust or combination in coffee or any scheme or plan for the valorization of coffee.

Fifth. The names and addresses of the parties purchasing the coffee involved in said suit, together with the price and the amount purchased by each.

Sixth. Copies of any memoranda, correspondence, letters, or documents on file in the Department of Justice pertaining to or connected with the settlement and dismissal of said action.

Seventh. Any additional statement that he may desire to make touching any of the above matters.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, in answer to that resolution which the Senate passed, the Attorney General, I think, has substantially complied with all the requests except the fifth, and that reads as follows:

Fifth. The names and addresses of the parties purchasing the coffee involved in said suit, together with the price and the amount purchased by each.

That was the thing I wanted to find, if anybody knew it; and the Attorney General, in his reply, has absolutely ignored that part of the request, and has made no reply to it whatever. Of course if he does not know who the purchasers of the coffee are, he would not be able to give us the names and addresses, but I think he ought at least to have said that he did not know. Of course he does not know; I was satisfied when I introduced the resolution that he did not; but I wanted an official acknowledgment that no one did know who bought the coffee, or how much any man bought or what he paid for it. I contend, Mr. President, if the names of the purchasers had been given, the probabilities are 100 to 1 that there are men in the department who would know as soon as they saw the names whether there had been a bona fide sale or not; and if there had not been a bona fide sale it would have given valuable information to the department in any future prosecution, criminal or civil, that it might desire to take under the new law that now is in existence.

I am satisfied that the Attorney General has been acting in good faith, although I believe if he had been in office before, if he had the personal knowledge his predecessor had, he would have done as his predecessor did—refuse to dismiss the suit until he had been given evidence that it was a bona fide sale. Without intending to criticize him, I do believe that these coffee magnates gave to the Attorney General a gold brick and made him believe that it was a genuine article. He has now a law on the statute books that his predecessor did not have, under which he would be able to seize every pound of that valorized coffee that came into the United States as soon as it was landed, sell it at public sale, confiscate it, and turn the proceeds over into the Treasury of the United States. It is a law that would apply in the same way to me or to you if we were importing articles. It applies to all alike; it is a general law, and it is no more severe against the people of Brazil than it is against anyone else.

But, Mr. President, I believe that if the American people really knew all the intricacies and all the details of this great plan of valorization of coffee they would refuse to submit further to it, even though there was one of the great civilized nations a party to the combination.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. NELSON. Is that valorization scheme still subsisting and pending?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. And active?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. If that is the case, why would it not be a good plan to put into this tariff bill a provision charging coffee of that kind with a heavy duty? Would not that be a good way to reach it?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I do not care to discuss that question. I did discuss that very point at length in the House of Representatives. There are a good many men who think that might be accomplished, and I think we might frame a bill, probably, that would do it; but the present law if enforced would break up this combination, and if the same kind of law were applied to other combinations, so that the property itself could be taken and confiscated to the Government then such criminal and unholy combinations would cease. But I am not in favor of placing a tariff on coffee. If there was a tariff on coffee, our Democratic friends would blame this gigantic trust to the tariff. This is one trust that surely can not be charged to the tariff.

Mr. President, if we must submit to it because there is a great Government that is interested in the scheme, then we might just as well apply for a national receiver and go out of business. It does not seem to me that in any view we might take of it we can concede for a moment that we will give to men who are backed up by a Government freedom from prosecution under our criminal statutes, as Sielcken has been given during these years. Neither can we afford to give protection to the product of any foreign Government that is the subject of such a criminal combination.

I have no desire to get into dispute with Brazil or to have any unfriendly feelings spring up between this Government and that. I have nothing but the friendliest feelings for Brazil and for her people. She is destined to become one of the greatest nations of the world, in my judgment. But we can not afford, whether she is great or whether she is small, not only to permit her to violate our laws, but permit our own citizens when they represent her to violate our criminal laws and violate our antitrust laws, and give to them a right to do lawfully what we deny all other citizens the right to do.

Mr. President, I want to ask leave to have printed as a Senate document the report of the special attorney who was appointed originally to make this investigation, and who did make a very full and complete report on the entire valorization scheme. I ask leave to have printed as a public document the report of Special Agent Chantland, of the Department of Justice.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. NORRIS. At the suggestion of some other Senators who have suggested that I make the request, I ask that this report of Mr. Chantland be also printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator really think it is necessary to have it in the RECORD when it is published as a public document?

Mr. NORRIS. Several Senators have just called my attention to it, and said they would like to have it printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. I think it very much better to have it printed as a public document.

Mr. NORRIS. I think that is true. I do not want to withdraw my request to have the report printed as a public document. I do not want the Senator to get that idea.

Mr. SMOOT. What will be the benefit to have it printed in the RECORD?

Mr. NORRIS. As far as I am concerned, I will say to the Senator that personally I have no particular desire to have it printed in the RECORD. I made the request at the suggestion of other Senators.

Mr. LANE. It is a matter of giving publicity to important information, in my opinion.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, everybody who is interested in the information can get it through the public document. I do not believe the RECORD ought to be encumbered with so many things. I shall object, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made to the request to print the report in the RECORD.

Mr. Wickersham's letter, which was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, is as follows:

JUNE 3, 1912.

THE PRESIDENT, The White House.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I want to make clear my views with respect to the valorization suit.

The defendants in that suit are individuals—German bankers and one American coffee merchant—who constitute a committee empowered to control the sale of the coffee held under the valorization scheme. On the argument before the circuit court in New York the Solicitor General expressly disclaimed, as does the petition in the suit, any proceeding whatever against the Republic of Brazil. So far as the State of Sao Paulo is concerned, he quoted the language of Chief Justice Marshall in United States v. Planters' Bank (9 Wheat., 904):

"It is, we think, a sound principle that when a Government becomes a partner in any trading company it divests itself, so far as concerns the transactions of that company, of its sovereign character and takes that of a private citizen. Instead of communicating to the company its privileges or prerogatives, it descends to the level of those with whom it associates itself, and takes the character which belongs to its associates and to the business which is to be transacted."

And he referred to the decision in the South Carolina Dispensary case (199 U. S., 437), to the effect that—

"When the State of South Carolina engaged in the business of selling intoxicating liquors it stood upon the footing of any individual engaged in that business, and was subject to the laws of the United States with respect thereto."

He contended that when the property of the foreign State was brought within the jurisdiction of this country it became subject to our laws, police and municipal, and subject to taxation. Moreover, it was developed in the course of the argument and in the affidavits filed that just before the existing agreements under which the operation is being carried out were made the committee brought within the United States a large amount of coffee, namely, 1,744,000 bags, which had come here and become a part of the property engaged in commerce in this country, a large portion of which was actually purchased within the United States, and that of that amount 440,000 bags were left. It appeared, moreover, that 600,000 bags which were sold by the committee in April, 1911, and which the Brazilian ambassador, in response to an inquiry from our State Department, stated had been made "directly to various purchasers in the West, South, and East," had, as a matter of fact, been sold to Mr. Herman Sielcken individually, and by him resold at a personal profit.

The agreements under which the committee, who are the defendants in the bill, had carried on their operations for the last three years gave them plenary power over the marketing of the entire amount which was brought under the agreement, the only restriction being that the trade should always have at its disposal the quantities which it required "at a price not lower than 47 francs per 50 kilos good average, and 50 francs for Havre type superior."

As a matter of fact, the bill alleges and the proof demonstrates that the operations of the committee resulted in more than doubling that minimum price. There was published in the Journal of Commerce April 3, 1909, a telegram from the secretary of the Brazilian Embassy at Washington quoting a cable received at the embassy from the minister of finance of Sao Paulo, which expressly stated:

"The government of Sao Paulo is no longer engaged in any valorization operations, and ceased entirely with its intervention in the market with the signing of the fifteen million pound sterling loan. All the coffee stock belonging to the State has been delivered to a committee of bankers authorized to sell it. The committee is obliged to sell in accordance with the contract, at the market price, and to the amount of 500,000 bags during the year 1909–10, 600,000 during the year 1910–11, and 700,000 bags during the year 1911–12, and an equal amount in the following years. The committee can, however, sell all or any coffee as soon as the price will reach 47 francs per 50 kilos of good average."

That telegram was sent at a time when our Government was about to revise the tariff on imports, and was for the purpose of influencing Congress against imposing a duty on imports of coffee; and the dispatch went on to say:

"There is therefore no action of this Government to advance the price of coffee, as its whole stock can be sold within a few years at the market price."

As we consume in this country between five and six million bags of Brazilian coffee of 60 kilos, or about 132 pounds each, and as the advance in price of 1 cent a pound amounts to about $10,000,000, the effect of the manipulations in the market by the committee, which have increased the price from 7 to about 14 cents a pound within three years, have, of course, resulted in laying a tax of $70,000,000 upon our people.

In his argument before the circuit court the Solicitor General conceded the right of the State of Sao Paulo and the Government of Brazil to enact laws looking to the increase in the price of coffee as it pleased, and that its citizens and legislators when so doing were no doubt animated by patriotic motives; but he pointed out that neither individuals nor institutions in the United States could have had any other motive than gain in participating in those arrangements; and he contended that when they came within the jurisdiction of our laws and not only brought coffee which belonged to the State of Sao Paulo, which was purchased by the State at home out of the valorization loan, but also purchased in this country a large amount which they withdrew from the channels of trade in this country for the express purpose of increasing the price of the commodity dealt in in our markets, and then proceeded to so hold and dispose of the same in our country as to bring about the extraordinary rise in price shown in this case, everyone concerned in that transaction and the property employed in it who or which are within our jurisdiction became amenable to our laws.

The relief prayed for in the petition is that it be adjudged that the scheme, "in so far as the same affects the interstate and foreign commerce of the United States and has been and is being consummated within the United States, be declared violative of" the antitrust law. That all acts of the committee and each of its members committed personally or through agents done in pursuance of said conspiracies, "in so far as they have been carried out in the United States or restrain the interstate and foreign trade and commerce of the United States, be declared unlawful."

That defendant Sielcken, personally, and as a member and agent for said committee, be permanently enjoined from withholding from the market the coffee held by him as a member and agent of the committee, and stored in New York, as described in the petition, and from selling the same on condition that the purchaser will not recall the same. The remainder of the prayer is for temporary relief.

The circuit court, in denying the motion for an injunction pendente lite, said:

"The numerous issues of fact and law which have been referred to on the hearing present important questions and contain too many elements of uncertainty to be decided summarily in advance of the trial. They may, with greater propriety, be disposed of when the testimony shall have disclosed the exact facts. We are not persuaded by anything in the papers submitted that there is any reason to apprehend that in the interim there will be such changes in the situation as will injuriously affect the position of the Government."

The bringing of this suit has been made the subject of sharp attack upon, and criticism of, the Department of Justice, as was to be supposed when it is considered that one-third of the great loan of money which was negotiated to carry out this transaction was made by a national bank in New York; and on the argument Mr. Choate permitted himself to make a statement which was widely quoted in the press, to the effect that the Government proposed as a remedy to be administered by the court, sooner or later, that it should force a sale of the coffee on store in New York "to break the market and make the fortune of somebody who was represented probably indirectly behind this suit."

The Brazilian ambassador also permitted himself to indulge in criticism of the Department of Justice in a speech made in the presence of the Secretary of State on the evening of Monday, May 27, in which he is reported to have referred to the suit as inflicting a heavy blow to our commercial relations—

"With the indorsement by the Government of the United States of the somewhat arbitrary and quite revolutionary doctrine of paying for other people's merchandise not the price they ask for it, but the price the United States—I mean the American merchants—want to pay for it.

"It is a brand new doctrine, and the United States seemed disposed to enforce it, even to the sacrifice of long-standing international friendship. In their eagerness to establish their right to meddle with the property of a foreign State certain officials of this Government went as far as to proclaim before an American court of justice the forfeiture of the sovereignty of that foreign State, and this with an unthoughtfulness of the consideration due to a friendly State which coincides with the boundaries of international discourtesy."

The ambassador evidently was not aware when he spoke that the language used by the Solicitor General, which he thus criticizes, was that of the Chief Justice of the United States, nor that his very complaint had been considered and decided adversely upon as early as 1812 by Chief Justice Marshall in the case of The Schooner Exchange v. M'Faddon (7 Cranch, 116), in which the Chief Justice very carefully drew the distinction between the immunity from prosecution in our courts enjoyed by an armed national vessel of another country found within the waters of the United States and private property of a foreign sovereign brought within our jurisdiction. He said that there was "a manifest distinction between the private property of the person who happens to be a prince, and that military force which supports the sovereign power and maintains the dignity and the independence of a nation. A prince, by acquiring private property in a foreign country, may possibly be considered as subjecting that property to the territorial jurisdiction; he may be considered as so far laying down the prince and assuming the character of a private individual; but this he can not be presumed to do with respect to any portion of that armed force which upholds his crown and the nation he is intrusted to govern."

The same distinction was drawn by Justice Story in the case of the Santissima Trinidad (7 Wheat., 283), where, while fully recognizing the doctrine of international law that foreign public ships coming into our ports and demeaning themselves according to law and in a friendly manner, are exempt from local jurisdiction, he said, after stating that, as a general proposition, all persons and property within the territorial jurisdiction of a sovereign are amenable to the jurisdiction of that sovereign and his courts, and that exceptions to that rule were such only as by common usage and public policy had been allowed in order to preserve the position and harmony of nations and to regulate their intercourse in the manner best suited to their dignity and rights.

"It would indeed be strange if a license implied by law from the general practice of nations for the purposes of peace should be construed as a license to do wrong to the nation itself, and justify the breach of all those obligations which good faith and friendship, by the same implication, impose upon those who seek an asylum in our ports."

This is the same doctrine which we have applied with respect to the State of our own Union, and in the case of South Carolina v. United States (199 U. S., 437) it was held that agents of the State government carrying on the business of selling liquor under State authority were liable to pay the annual revenue tax imposed by the Federal Government, the rule applied being, to quote the comment on it in Flint v. Stone Tracy Co. (220 U. S., 157)—

"that the exemption of State agencies and instrumentalities from national taxation was limited to those of a strictly governmental character, and did not extend to those used by the State in carrying on business of a private character."

In other words, on principle and on authority, there seems to be no basis for the contention that a state of a foreign nation can combine with bankers and coffee merchants to monopolize and enhance the price of an article of common necessity in the United States, of which our citizens consume an enormous quantity, import that commodity into our territorial jurisdiction, and there carry out the powers which they have acquired through that monopoly to the enhancement of the price and the detriment of our own citizens, and then claim the protection of the alien sovereign to which they would be entitled if they were here in a sovereign capacity, as, for example, in the presence of an armed vessel of that nation or a military force crossing our territory with the permission of our Government.

Perhaps as good a comment as could be made of this whole transaction was one which appeared in a New York evening paper, the day following the argument in the circuit court, in the following language:

"We are by no means satisfied that, considering the peculiar governmental aspects of the matter, our Department of Justice was wise in pressing the case as it did—at all events, in filing suit without some friendly preliminary negotiations with Brazil. But there are some things to say on the other side, and one of them is that when a Government goes into trade and engages, directly or indirectly, in operations on the markets of a foreign state it thereby inevitably subjects itself to the laws of that state regulating trade and commerce. If our Government were to place an import duty on coffee, Brazil could hardly claim exemption for Government-owned coffee sent to be stored and marketed in this country. Or, to take a more extreme case, if the Brazilian or any other state were to engage in production of some article proscribed by our pure-food law, no one is likely to contend that consignments of that article would be free from the prohibitory clauses. The principles underlying the present suit are, first, that neither a foreign merchant nor a foreign government acting as a merchant is entitled to do in the American market what the American merchant is forbidden to do, and, second, that operations of the sort in question, if conducted by a private American syndicate, would be repugnant to the law. When the Brazilian ambassador speaks with easy confidence of the 'new American ways' and the 'brand-new doctrine' asserted by the Attorney General he appears to us to forget that of all new ways and brand-new doctrines the theory and practice of the 'coffee valorization plan' are among the very newest."

Under all of these circumstances I am very strongly of the opinion that the suit should be proceeded with in personam in an effort to obtain the permanent relief which has been prayed. I think that to yield in the face of the character and sources of the criticism that has been made would constitute a reflection on this department which should not be permitted.

Very sincerely, yours, GEORGE W. WICKERSHAM,
Attorney General.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. CATRON. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. FALL] has been suddenly called away from the city on account of the death of his father. He is paired on all questions where votes are required to be taken with the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-five Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I wish to confine myself briefly to the motion to refer and to the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. This involves the question of hearings before the Finance Committee of the several interests affected by the proposed tariff legislation. Matters that would justify the hearings are the questions that have arisen largely since former legislation was attempted on the subject, and hearings were then granted. At that time there was not the constitutional power to levy an income tax. Since that time, by proper amendment, the power now exists. Whatever might have been said, or whatever proposed legislation was attempted, was not then under the responsibility of constitutional sanction. Whatever is done now, beyond any question is authorized by the organic act as it has been amended.

The sobering effect of constitutional power would justify a hearing upon section 2 of the bill. There are sweeping provisions in that section. There are provisions that not only reach what seems to some of us an entirely justified matter of taxation, but it goes beyond the "malefactors of great wealth," the swollen fortunes, the incomes that are not needed for the support of those who have them or those dependent on them, and attacks the provident under the guise of income taxation. It taxes not only income, but it seeks to tax the protection which every prudent head of a house provides for those who are dependent either upon his activities as a wage earner or as an income producer for the family. I would be glad to have any additional information on this subject that could be given by a hearing before the committee.

I am entirely in accord with the exemption of fraternal life insurance associations or companies and building and loan associations from the operation of this proposed act. I would extend that exemption so as to include the companies doing a life-insurance business on a purely mutual plan without capital stock, without profit to any shareholder, and without profit to the members of the company. The company in such cases is the certificate or policyholder. They are only providing, by setting apart some of their earnings, for the inevitable time when those dependent upon them will need the results of their provident action. I think the introduction of this section into the bill would justify some additional hearings.

As originally prepared in the House of Representatives, the bill contained a provision that levied, under the guise of an income tax, a real inheritance tax upon the proceeds of life policies. That, upon a hearing, appeared to be indefensible and was stricken out, either in caucus or in committee; and it does not now appear in the bill. In order to more fully negative what was undertaken in the first instance, some affirmative language has been added so as to exclude the proceeds of life insurance companies from the operation of this bill. This is one provision of the measure that certainly is entitled to some hearings. If it were a matter of income alone, perhaps it might not be; but it is not a matter of income; it is a matter of protection. The only argument in its favor that I have heard offered up to this time is that there are certain large policyholders and certain life insurance companies in this country doing business on a purely mutual plan that run into a considerable sum on the face of the policy and in the reserve or surplus set aside for the security of the several policyholders. That is a matter certainly which is entitled to some hearing and some consideration at the hands of the committee.

Another section is section 3, known as the administrative features of the bill. Section 3 largely, if not entirely, concerns itself with the regulations at home and abroad that are consequent upon a different basis of import duties.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. REED. I want to ask the Senator from Illinois simply this question: If he does not think that the language of the bill as it now is does exempt all policies—that is, the payment upon all policies—of life insurance, the payment upon all annuities, and the payment of all other sums provided for in the contract? I ask the Senator if he has examined the amendment which was made to the printed text? I do not know that I make myself plain.

Mr. SHERMAN. It may be I do not understand the Senator. Will he please repeat the question?

Mr. REED. I do not want to interrupt the Senator, and perhaps should not have arisen to do so; but I wanted to ask the Senator whether he had examined the bill as it is now written, and if he wants to be understood as saying that the bill does not exempt from taxation not only the amount paid upon the face of the policy at death, but all annuities and all other sums which are paid by reason of the contract? I ask if he does not understand that they are exempted from taxation?

Mr. SHERMAN. I understand they are exempted in the amended bill as it came to us.

Mr. REED. Is not everything that goes to the policyholder exempted in the amended bill; and is not the sole tax which is levied under the amended bill a tax upon the net profits, the net income of a company?

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir; it is not. I do not think, in its present form, that that is the necessary effect of the section or of the several sections which relate to this matter.

Mr. REED. Well, I was very anxious to know whether the Senator took that position. If he does, well and good.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I have no criticism to make of the exemptions made, so far as they go, but I do not think they go far enough. To that end I have thought that it would be entirely proper that we should collect such available information as the committee might have offered to it, in order that we might be further enlightened.

The administrative feature which I mentioned is necessary because of the change in the method of levying duties. Ad valorem rates of duty necessarily require a much more inquisitorial process of collection than the simpler method of specific duties. There are two provisions, however, in section 3 that penalize not the manufacturer or jobber in another country, nor those who are responsible for whatever failure to give evidence may occur, but they penalize the jobber and the importer in this country, without an opportunity to reach the source of the trouble. It is provided that the merchandise shall be excluded from entry in the event that the manufacturer or wholesaler in a foreign country refuses to give certain specified information. It penalizes the jobber or wholesaler in this country if the retail merchant refuses to give the information. The latter can be reached, because the retailer in this country is within our jurisdiction, while the mnufacturer or wholesaler in a foreign country can not be reached by any process that will be effective as a remedy to exempt the domestic importer from the results of the refusal of the foreign authorities to give the information. This will in itself be a most effective way of preventing the innocent party from conducting his business and of exempting the guilty party from the operation of his refusal.

There are, in addition, some matters in this bill that have occasioned protest, which it seems fair that the committee should hear. There are in the western and northwestern portions of this country and elsewhere extensive flouring mills. They have invested a considerable sum of money. There are many thousands of them conducting their operations. It is one of the industries as to which not even a charge nor a suspicion of combination has been made to raise the price of their product or to limit their output. There is no flour-mill trust in this country. The different flouring mills have maintained business on a purely competitive basis. In this bill the peculiar process to me is that the millers' raw material, as they properly protest, is made dutiable and the finished product is free listed. On that the communications that come to me have been numerous. I select from the number two of them which are fairly typical of the entire situation. The first is from the Sparks Milling Co., of Alton, Ill. I ask unanimous consent that their letter may be inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks, without consuming the time of the Senate in reading it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there is no objection, permission is granted.

The letter referred to is as follows:

SPARKS MILLING CO.,
Alton, Ill., U. S. A., April 8, 1913.

Hon. LAWRENCE Y. SHERMAN, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We desire to call your especial attention to the tariff bill as reported by the Ways and Means Committee of the House, and which, if possible, we desire to have changed before it is reported by the Senate Finance Committee.

The bill provides for a duty of 10 cents per bushel on wheat and 10 per cent ad valorem on flour.

The above would be a discrimination against the American miller equivalent to about 7 cents per barrel on flour. For example, taking Canadian wheat at 90 cents per bushel, it would require, say, 4 bushels and 35 pounds to make a barrel of flour. The duty on the 4 bushels and 35 pounds would be equal to 45.83 cents on a barrel of flour. A barrel of flour made from 90-cent wheat costs approximately $3.85. Therefore ad valorem duty on the flour would be 38.5 cents per barrel, against a duty on the corresponding quantity of wheat of 45.8 cents, or 7.3 cents per barrel discrimination against the wheat.

It is easy to see that this would be highly in favor of the large Canadian mills and against all the mills in this country

We feel that the duty on wheat and flour, whatever it may be, should be exactly the same; that is, there should be ad valorem duty on both wheat and flour or specific duty on both wheat and flour.

The specific duty on flour equivalent to 10 cents per bushel duty on wheat would be approximately 46 cents per barrel.

The bill further provides that countries admitting our flour free can ship flour duty free to this country. At the present time this would give the British millers an opportunity to make flour from cheap Russian, Indian, and Argentina wheat and ship it into this country duty free, to be sold in competition with flour made by American mills from American wheat. This in itself would be a serious blow to American millers, as there are very large and modern mills in England, particularly in Liverpool, which, under such an arrangement as this, could, and no doubt would, ship thousands of barrels of flour to our eastern markets.

At the present time Canada has a duty against imported flour, but if our bill is passed in its present form there is hardly any doubt but what Canada would immediately take off the duty on flour, which would permit their mills to ship flour into this country free, while there would be a duty against their wheat, thus giving their mills a big advantage, as, of course, the flour market in this country is a great deal larger than that of Canada.

We will certainly appreciate anything you can do toward eliminating the "free-flour" clause and also toward making absolutely the same duty on flour as is imposed upon wheat.

You will note from the above that we are not asking protection on flour, but are trying to avoid a discrimination in favor of foreign manufactured products compared to foreign raw material.

Yours, truly,

SPARKS MILLING COMPANY.
GEO. S. MILNOR.

Mr. SHERMAN. The second is from the B. A. Eckhart Milling Co., of Chicago, Ill. I make the same request as to their letter in order to save time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there is no objection, the letter will be inserted in the RECORD, as requested.

The letter referred to is as follows:

CHICAGO, April 12, 1913.

Hon. LAWRENCE Y. SHERMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: If the bill agreed upon by the Ways and Means Committee of the House should pass in its present form in relation to wheat and flour the foreign mills, who have the enormous advantage of cheap wheat duty free from Canada, Russia, Argentina, India, and Australia, would either destroy the American milling industry or else the tariff of 10 cents a bushel on foreign wheat would and could not afford the American farmer any protection.

If flour is admitted duty free the foreign millers could flood our country with flour made from cheap foreign wheat, and a tariff of 10 cents per bushel on wheat would not benefit our farmers at all, as the admission of free flour would destroy the American milling industry, and, therefore, the American farmer could not hope to sell his wheat to the American miller.

The American farmer would be obliged to export his wheat and sell it in competition with other wheat-producing countries and accept such prices as Liverpool would be willing to pay for the wheat. Furthermore, Canada would take off her duty on American-manufactured flour, and hence could ship, duty free, Canadian-manufactured flour to this country, made from Canadian wheat raised on new, cheap land. This would be an easy matter for Canada to do, because there is comparatively little flour consumed in Canada, as their population of about 6,000,000 is relatively small compared with the population of the United States of 90,000,000; and as Canada has a very large milling capacity they would flood the American market with Canadian flour made from Canadian wheat, which is superior to our wheat in quality.

This would prevent the American farmer from disposing of his wheat to American millers, so long as Canada and Great Britain would be able to supply the consumers of this country with flour made from cheap wheat raised in foreign countries.

Great Britain is not dependent at all upon the United States for her supply of wheat; in fact, of late years she has been able to secure much cheaper wheat from Canada, Argentina, and India, countries where land and labor is much cheaper than in America.

As I understand the report of the committee in respect to wheat and flour, countries admitting our flour free can ship flour to this country duty free.

A duty of 10 cents per bushel on wheat is equal to 50 cents per barrel on flour, as it requires about five bushels of wheat to produce a barrel of flour.

The average profit to the American miller is less than 10 cents per barrel on flour, and as the ocean freight from England, Belgium, Holland, Germany, and Canada to our great central markets—such as New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Boston—is a comparatively small item, as all of these markets can be reached by cheap water transportation, it would give the foreign miller who has free wheat an enormous advantage over the American miller.

According to the last census there are about 11,000 mills in the United States, grinding about 500,000,000 bushels of American wheat. These great milling plants are scattered over 46 States of the Union. The amount of money invested in flour mills is over $450,000,000. The value of the product of the mills is over $900,000,000.

To adopt such a policy as outlined by the report of the Ways and Means Committee would be an economic fallacy disastrous both to the American farmer and the American miller.

It is inconceivable how intelligent men can possibly propose such a policy, much less enact it into a law. We must therefore appeal to the Senators of the United States for justice and fair play. I know that I need only to call your attention to this unfair and fallacious proposition to enlist your earnest and hearty support in behalf of the American miller and the American farmer.

With kindest regards, I am,
Sincerely, your friend,
B. A. ECKHART.

P. S.—I take the liberty of inclosing a copy of an editorial from the Northwestern Miller of April 9, 1913.

Mr. SHERMAN. The criticism very properly is made—and I think it ought to be considered by the Finance Committee—that the making dutiable of their raw material, which is the farmers' finished product, wheat, can not well be defended when their finished product, flour, is free listed. They call attention in what I think is a perfectly legitimate way to the competition to which they will be necessarily exposed. The mills all the way from the Southwest, in the far Mississippi Valley, to the extreme Northwest, touching the Canadian line, are affected vitally by such a provision. They are exposed to competition from wheat collected from the entire world wherever it is accessible as a merchantable product, and, with cheap ocean freight, it will put our millers and the men who produce the wheat in direct and open competition, without any compensating advantages in the way of an import duty.

There has been a statement made, further, that I think the committee ought properly to consider. It has been made by authority we can not well ignore, and it has been repeated on the floor of the Senate that, in the event this bill in its present form should become the law on that subject, if any gentleman now in business in this country should see fit to suspend either one or all his or their business and cease to give employment to the workmen, it will be made the subject of an investigation, without benefit of clergy, under the Sherman antitrust law for a conspiracy to restrain or hinder trade in its natural operation. Whatever may be the condition of things, to use the euphonic language quoted by my friend yesterday, it will make no difference whether or not such action interferes with the normal and healthy course of commerce and manufacture, all such employers are now threatened in advance that if the operation of this bill should be such as to make it unprofitable for them to carry on business, and one or more of them should suspend operations, they are to be threatened with the penalty of an indictment, at least, whether or not at the hands of a jury they should ever be convicted. I believe this would justify us in at least listening to those opposed to some other features of this bill who were not present at the last hearing, something like a year ago.

Another thing that seems to me material, although I have not any doubt it has been maturely considered every time any tariff bill has been up for consideration, is the time when the bill shall become operative. From the quarter of the country from which I come, and with whose business operations I am familiar, there comes what I consider a reasonable request. Many millions of dollars of merchandise are stored in warehouses; it belongs to and is a part of the current commerce of the country. Manufacturers are now, or in the ordinary course of trade will be, under contract for furnishing merchandise in the future under present conditions. In the course of modern competition no merchandise of certain kinds can be made up in anticipation and stored in warehouses to await orders from the trade. They must, in the ordinary way of business, be prepared long in advance. Many of these concerns are not merely order-merchandise manufacturers, but they must secure contracts many months, sometimes 6 to 12 months, in advance to prepare for orders taken and for prompt deliveries in accordance with their terms. Warehouses are, in some instances, not only full of goods manufactured under present conditions, but the conditions of the trade are such that it is necessary that this act shall become operative at some time in the future instead of becoming immediately so.

The condition of the clothing trade is a fair illustration, which would require, under present conditions, postponement of the operation of the act until about the 1st day of January, 1914, in order not to unduly interfere with the healthy growth, development, and manufacture of the country. That language I do not say, Mr. President, is original, but I am adapting it to be used on this occasion as entirely applicable. I think the question ought to be submitted to the Finance Committee in accordance with the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania, so that the different industries may be considered, and that, if any differences exist in the necessary method of transacting business, those differences may be adjusted and that the proper time may be fixed when the act shall become operative upon those lines most concerned. To arrive at such a readjustment as will be indispensable in a bill that reaches into every nook and corner of commerce, manufacturing, and industrial activity, it seems to me that it would be wise to allow those who would be so materially affected by it to be heard.

There will be some differences, some losses, some readjustment of prices, some rearrangement of the methods of manufacture and of distribution, some settlement of the finances necessary to conduct large enterprises. But these losses ought, in justice, to be reduced to a minimum. If time be given upon certain lines of manufacture and commerce they will be so reduced. To that end it seems as if these hearings could be profitably had in order that these different lines of effort might be so heard and differentiated that no undue loss would occur upon the application of the proposed law.

The last lines of the bill say that it shall become operative immediately upon its approval by the Chief Executive; so that in many of these cases it would interfere materially not only with contracts now made but with stocks of merchandise now on hand.

There is one further document that I wish to add that pertains to Schedule M and relates entirely to the lithographing business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

MAY 8, 1913.

To the Congress of the United States:

Schedule M, paragraph 412, of the tariff act of 1909, to provide revenue, equalize duties, and to encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes, provides that:

"Views of any landscape, scene, building, place, or locality in the United States on cardboard or paper, by whatever process printed or produced, including those wholly or in part produced by either lithographic or photogelatin process: Not thinner than eight one-thousandths inch, $0.15 per pound plus 25 per cent ad valorem."

H. R. 3321, the Underwood bill, paragraph 337, page 83, provides that:

"Views of any landscape, scene, building, place, or locality in the United States on cardboard or paper, not thinner than eight one-thousandths of an inch, by whatever process printed or produced, including those wholly or in part produced by either lithographic or photogelatin process (except show cards), occupying 35 square inches or less of surface per view, bound or unbound or in any other form, 45 per cent ad valorem."

The foregoing reduction in the duty on post cards it is evident will favor importations from foreign countries. The conditions covering their production make it possible for them to be sold in our market in unfair competition with American manufacturers of the like article. We quote below prices of a German manufacturer of Dresden, Germany, comparing them with our own colored view post cards of the same kind:

C. T. colorchrom:

1,000 per subject	$6.50 per M
2,000 per subject	5.50 per M

C. T. photochrom:

3,000 per subject	4.50 per M
5,000 per subject	3.50 per M
10,000 per subject	2.75 per M

Stengel & Co., Dresden, A, quotes style No. 22 colored view post cards:

By 1,000, at 15.50 marks	$3.72
Proposed 45 per cent ad valorem would be	1.67
Freight, etc	.30
	5.69
Curt Teich & Co.	6.50
Stengel & Co	5.69
	.81

By 1,000 cards per subject the importer can buy cards for 81 cents less per 1,000 view cards in Germany.

Stengel & Co., Dresden, A, quotes style No. 22 colored view post cards:

By 2,000, at 11.50 marks	$2.76
Proposed 45 per cent ad valorem would be	1.24
Freight, etc	.30
	4.30
Curt Teich & Co	5.50
Stengel & Co	4.30
	1.20

By 2,000 cards per subject the importer can buy cards for $1.20 less per 1,000 view cards in Germany.

Stengel & Co., Dresden, A, quotes style No. 22 colored view post cards:

By 3,000, at 10 marks	$2.40
Proposed 45 per cent ad valorem would be	1.08
Freight, etc	.30
	3.78
Curt Teich & Co	4.50
Stengel & Co	3.78
	.72

By 3,000 cards per subject the importer can buy cards for $0.72 less per 1,000 view cards in Germany.

Stengel & Co., Dresden, quotes:

By 5,000, at 8.75 marks	$2.10
Proposed 45 per cent ad valorem would be	.94
Freight, etc	.30
	3.34
Court Teich & Co	3.50
Stengel & Co	3.34
	.16

By 5,000 cards per subject the importer can buy for $0.16 less per thousand view cards in Germany.

The above figures show very plainly that the proposed 45 per cent ad valorem duty is not sufficient to place the American manufacturers of view post cards on an even basis with the foreign manufacturers.

Paragraph 337, page 83, should be revised to read as follows:

"Views of any landscape, scene, building, place, or locality in the United States on cardboard or paper, not thinner than eight one-thousandths of 1 inch, by whatever process printed or produced, including those wholly or in part produced by either lithographic or photogelatin process, any size (except show cards), bound or unbound, or in any other form, 15 cents per pound plus 25 per cent ad valorem.

That the rate in the Underwood bill confers very great advantage upon the foreign manufacturers is evident from the letter of Kunstanstalt Stengel & Co. (Ltd.), of Dresden, Germany, dated March 29, 1913, to certain dealers handling their cards in this country. It is as follows:

"During the year 1912 I had some correspondence with you in regard to the tariff revision, and you were kind enough to express your willingness to make some efforts for a reduction of the duty for view post cards imported into the United States of America.

"Mr. Wilson will have an extra session of the Congress next month especially for the revision of the tariff, and it is now the right time to come forth with your demand for lower rates on view post cards.

"In order that such a protest finds due attention it is necessary that it should be sent to all Democratic Congressmen and Democratic Senators. But care must be taken that nothing indicates that foreign houses are interested in this matter. Please be very particular about this point.

"I inclose a memorandum about the tariff on view cards, which will give you a lot of information needed in making up your protest. However, this memorandum must not be sent out to anyone; it is just for your own use.

"Thanking you in advance for the interest you will take in this matter, I remain, with best regards."

Every 1,000 view post cards weigh approximately 10 pounds. "Occupying 35 square inches or less of surface per view" should be left out, as double cards, size 3½ by 11, occupy 38.5 square inches; triple cards and panorama cards occupy more square inches in proportion.

At the present time there are about 3,000 artists and skilled mechanics employed in the manufacturing of local view and fancy post cards in the United States. The wages they receive are three times as high as paid to the same employees in Germany.

The largest portion, or about 60 per cent, of view post cards are printed in three and five thousand editions, bought and sold to the American public by the stationery and news companies and 5 cent and 10 cent store syndicates, who will naturally import their view cards should the proposed tariff of 45 per cent ad valorem be adopted. The syndicate stores buy mostly in 3,000 and 5,000 editions, for which they pay to the American manufacturer on an average of about $4 per thousand. The stationery and news companies, which buy their cards in one and two thousand editions, pay to the American manufacturer on an average of about $6 per thousand.

Under the proposed ad valorem tariff of 45 per cent ad valorem, any American dealer in post cards can import the same quality of view cards at a saving of about 75 cents per thousand, which reductions the American manufacturers can not meet for the fact that it costs them more for labor and material to manufacture these goods.

The United States Post Office Department statistics prove that during the year 1912 about 1,000,000,000 view and fancy post cards went through the mails of the United States, and it can safely be stated that the same amount of cards were kept as souvenirs for collections and used for other purposes, which shows that about 2,000,000,000 post cards are consumed every year in the United States, of which 80 per cent are at the present time manufactured in the United States by American labor, representing about a total sale of $5,000,000 per year. The largest part of this business will go to foreign manufacturers should the proposed tariff of 45 per cent ad valorem be adopted.

We also beg to state that if the ad valorem duty alone, instead of the pound and ad valorem rate, is substituted on this article, orders for view post cards will be taken in this country by importers and placed with foreign manufacturers, giving part of the work, such as plate making, to one firm, the printing to another, and the lithographing to a third firm. This has been done previously and will be done again in order to get the very lowest prices, and if the work, in the opinion of the importer, is not satisfactory, the importers will ask for large deductions. The cards will then be shipped to the United States and billed at a ridiculously low price and will cost the importer, with only the ad valorem duty added, less than what the American manufacturer has to pay for his labor and paper stock, thereby forcing the American manufacturer to discontinue the manufacture of view post cards. Also large amounts of local view post cards will be ordered, and when they reach this country will be left at the customhouses to be disposed of by the Government. The records of the customhouse in New York and other cities will prove that millions upon millions of view post cards were sold in this country for less than duty charges.

CURT TEISH & Co. (INC.).
CURT TEISH, President.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I was absent a portion of the time when the Senator was discussing the provision relating to life insurance policies, and I did not hear all that he said. My mail is flooded with letters, chiefly from policyholders in mutual companies, complaining that the provision of the bill is hostile to their interests. The Senator observed, which I have understood to be the fact, that the bill had been changed in that particular so as to give some degree of relief; but I think the Senator further observed that he thought it did not go far enough.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator—because I want, as far as I can, to give accurate information to my correspondents—whether or not the Senator has prepared or will suggest an amendment to that section of the bill which will give these people full relief to the extent that they ought to have relief?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; I have.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is satisfactory, then.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have already offered that as a proposed amendment, Mr. President. It will be submitted for consideration at the proper time and place.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I agree with all that has been stated by the Senator from Illinois in relation to the necessity of having hearings upon the tariff bill that is now about to be referred to the Finance Committee. Agreeing with those reasons given by him, I want to take just a short time to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that there are many other reasons why public hearings should be had. In fact, we have had no hearings whatever upon any bill that is before the Senate at this time. The bills introduced have been changed so radically that no manufacturer of this country, or no person interested in any item in the bill, knows what the rates are, unless he has received a copy of the bill since it has been received by the Senate.

Barring all of the bills that were before the previous Congress, and barring the hearings that have been had upon them, let us see what changes have been made in the first tariff bill introduced by Mr. UNDERWOOD in the House of Representatives on the 7th day of April, 1913, compared with the second bill that was introduced by him on April 21, 1913, and pay no attention whatever to the changes that were made on the floor of the House.

Mr. President, I find in the first bill that was introduced by Mr. UNDERWOOD that alizarin was placed upon the dutiable list at 10 per cent. I also find that indigo was placed upon the dutiable list at 10 per cent. But I find that when the second bill was introduced into the House of Representatives alizarin was still upon the dutiable list at 10 per cent, but indigo was placed upon the free list. Why the change in the one and not the other?

The reason is because indigo is used by the cotton manufacturers of the South in dyeing denims and cotton goods, and they had a voice so potential with members of the Ways and Means Committee that that item was taken from the dutiable list at 10 per cent and placed upon the free list, while alizarin, used by the woolen manufacturers of the North, the Middle West, and the East, still remains upon the dutiable list at 10 per cent. Further than that, Mr. President, I find that they have omitted from the alizarin paragraph of the present law these words:

And dyes derived from alizarin or from anthracene.

Senators, alizarin technically means a dye that will produce the color red. The derivatives of alizarin cover hundreds of different colors—browns, blues, blacks, oranges—almost every color known to the woolen trade. The words "and dyes derived from alizarin or from anthracene" throw all these colors into another paragraph, with a 30 per cent duty imposed. I find that the coal-tar dyes are given a rate of duty of 30 per cent, no change whatever from the present law; and by the striking out of these words all of the derivatives from alizarin, that have been on the free list ever since they were first made, are thrown into the paragraph that carries a 30 per cent duty.

Should not this be called to the attention of the committee? This is only one item. If I had the time I could show not only a change in this one item, but changes on nearly every other page of the bill. I believe I can see what influences have been at work and what pressure was brought to bear upon those who had the power to change the bill.

I say to the Senators upon the other side of this Chamber that the people interested in this tariff bill have not had a chance to be heard on the bill as it passed the House, and they are pleading for it from one end of this country to the other. It seems to me, Mr. President, that it all depends upon whose ox is gored. I remember that when the cotton schedule was up in the Senate a year ago the Senators from North Carolina demanded public hearings; and they demanded them because the cotton manufacturers of the South demanded them. I have here the remarks of the Senators from North Carolina made at that time, and I am not asking any more to-day than those Senators then asked of the Senate of the United States.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. When the Payne-Aldrich bill was up, did you give public hearings?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes, Mr. President. Representatives of every industry in this country and everyone interested in the bill had all the time to be heard they desired. I will say to the Senator that when the bill was in the House of Representatives there were nine volumes of testimony taken upon that particular bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator allow me to ask whether public hearings were granted by the whole committee on the Payne-Aldrich bill?

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator mean by the Senate or by the House of Representatives?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I mean by the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. I have said time and again, Mr. President, that there were no public hearings reported or held before the full committee on the Payne-Aldrich bill, and I have stated the reasons for it. The Payne-Aldrich bill was introduced into the House of Representatives, and hearings were held upon every schedule and every item of that bill. That is not the case here to-day. You have had no hearings whatever upon any bill that is before the Senate of the United States. The hearings that were given by the Ways and Means Committee of the House were upon no bill. The persons who were heard were allowed to come and express themselves as to whether or not they wanted any particular change in the present rates. That is the difference between the attitude taken in the Senate under the Payne-Aldrich bill and the one that is being taken at the present time.

I have heard it said that there were not going to be many changes made in the House bill, and yet I have come in contact with men who have stated that they are perfectly satisfied now that their interests are going to be taken care of. I have here a circular from the Amoskeag Manufacturing Co. I ask the Senators to take notice of the bill as it is received by the Senate and then watch the changes made when it is reported back to the Senate from the Finance Committee. I have no doubt but that the cotton schedule will be changed. I have no doubt but what some of the cotton rates are to be taken care of. But why change the cotton schedule any more than the wool schedule? Why take the cotton schedule any more than the sugar schedule?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. As that is one of the schedules submitted to my subcommittee, I will tell the Senator why it is being carefully examined by the subcommittee. If the Senator will allow me further, I will add that we have heard everybody that wanted to discuss the chemical schedule; we have heard men on the paper schedule; and we are hearing every man who wants to be heard on either one of the schedules submitted to us.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator say that he has not promised men representing the cotton interests, and interested in the cotton schedule, that the rate shall not be changed?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have promised nobody anything.

Mr. SMOOT. I am glad to hear the Senator say it, because I have heard otherwise.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And if the Senator will allow me further, I will say that we are hearing to-day, as we did yesterday, and as we have for a week, men on this cotton schedule from Maine to South Carolina. The same thing that we are doing with reference to that schedule we are ready to do with every schedule that is submitted to Senator JOHNSON of Maine, Senator HUGHES of New Jersey, and myself.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah allow me to ask the Senator from Georgia a question?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. When the Senator says "we are hearing," to whom does he refer—the Finance Committee?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I mean the subcommittee to which those schedules were referred.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. By whom?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. By the Democrats of the Finance Committee.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. How many members are there of the Finance Committee?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There are 17 members.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. How many Democratic members?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There are 10 Democratic members.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. How many members are there of the subcommittee?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There are three.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Do any of the Democratic members of the committee, except the three, have the cotton schedule in charge?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The three have it first in charge. The three will carry back to all of the Democrats of the committee the result of their work, and the 10 Democrats will then go over the schedules together. We are sitting down in the room below, permitting Senators and Congressmen, anyone who wishes, to come, and we are taking up the criticized provisions in the schedule. We are taking up any provisions in those schedules that are criticized, consolidating, as far as we can, the men who wish to criticize them, and hearing them together.

I can not better illustrate what we are doing than by what we have been doing to-day. To-day we had before us the presidents of two great organizations of cotton-manufacturing companies and a dozen additional manufacturers. We also had Senator LIPPITT with us nearly the entire day. We allowed them to point out paragraph after paragraph that they criticized and to file their written briefs upon them, and to give us all the information they wished. The room was large; the door was open; anyone who wished or who was willing to be there could come. Republican Senators, Republican Members of the House, and Democratic Members of the House have brought their representatives before us and have stayed with us during the examinations.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I know the Senator from Georgia is doing his entire duty as a Senator in being informed upon the cotton and other schedules which he has in immediate charge. I know he is listening patiently to the suggestions of any interest that may appear before him. But I think the Senator will hardly say that a hearing before a subcommittee of 3 of a large committee of 17 is a public hearing before that committee in the sense in which public hearings are usually spoken of.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I am glad to have an opportunity to answer the Senator. I do not believe it would be possible for 17 men to get the benefit from these conferences that we three get. I do not think a public meeting consisting of 17 men could do the work so effectively. We have passed from that stage of the investigation. There are volumes upon volumes of testimony that has been taken in that way. If additional information is desired by any Senator upon any schedule or any item of a schedule referred to our subcommittee, we will be glad to furnish him briefs and point him to ten times the written testimony that he will undertake to examine.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, of course I know that this bill is going to be referred to the 10 Democrats upon the Finance Committee, and I believe I know that it will not stop there. I believe I know that it will then be taken to the caucus, and whatever the caucus decides the Democratic Members of the Senate are going to follow.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think that is very probably true.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what I predict.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is a Democratic measure and it ought to be presented as a Democratic measure, and we are going to take the responsibility for it when it is passed.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; and I am pleased that you will have to take the responsibility. But I was going to ask the Senator whether he thinks it proper that Senators who do not believe that rates fixed in any particular schedule by a Democratic caucus are right, who believe they will bring ruin to the industries in their States, should be bound by a caucus rule as to how they should vote?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will answer the Senator. I do not believe it is possible for a complete tariff schedule to be made up which would entirely satisfy anyone. I do not expect the schedules that our committee agrees upon to satisfy me entirely. A schedule covering thousands of items will be made up finally by mutual concessions, and the responsibility will be upon each Senator when the entire bill is made up to determine whether he does or does not prefer the measure to the present law.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah permit me to ask the Senator from Georgia a question?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should like to ask my friend from Georgia whether the manufacturers of the country generally understand, or have had any means of understanding, that these hearings are being held by the subcommittees?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have no doubt of it. I will state the extent to which we have gone. I know all the cotton-manufacturing men understand it, and are formally represented here to-day.

Mr. SMOOT. Cotton, of course.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And I want to say to the Senator that there is no effort to increase the rates on cotton manufactures in my State.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. One moment, Mr. President. I think it is due me to reply to that side remark of the Senator. He turned his back upon me, and, looking in the other direction, said, "Yes; cotton." Undoubtedly the just impression that anyone might get who did not know his relations to me, which are most cordial, might be that he meant I wanted to take care of cotton because my people manufactured it, and to disregard everything else. I want the privilege of answering that. Not a suggestion of a raise of a rate on cotton manufactured goods has come to me from Georgia. The rates that we are studying are upon the higher fabrics, the finer fabrics, manufactured in New England.

Mr. SMOOT. Such as ginghams?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; that is one of them.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not say anyone from Georgia has come to the Senator for advances on rates on cotton.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; but you insinuate——

Mr. SMOOT. I will more than insinuate now.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I state that it is untrue that anybody has come to me from Georgia upon this subject or with reference to Georgia interests. The Senator must not insinuate that that is influencing me in the matter either, because that would not be right.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if the Senator had just waited a moment——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will wait. I wait, Mr. President. In the most amiable manner, I wait.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator had just waited, all that he has said would have been unnecessary. I do not claim that anyone from Georgia has come directly to the Senator; but I do claim that representatives of the cotton associations have been here, and that they represent every cotton industry of the South. What difference does it make, Mr. President, whether they come directly from Georgia or whether they send their representatives here, representing all of the cotton industries of the country?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is true, Mr. President.

Mr. SMOOT. That is all I was going to say, Mr. President. That is all I did say; and the Senator has placed upon what I said a construction that was uncalled for.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What I wanted to emphasize was that the places in the schedule to which our attention is being particularly called by people asking for a reclassification apply almost exclusively to New England manufactures, where the higher fabrics and productions are made, and where it is insisted that sufficient recognition of the cost of conversion is not found, by proper classifications, in the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. That will all be pointed out, Mr. President, when the bill comes into the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me to repeat my question to the Senator from Georgia——

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I want to give intelligent information to my constituents. There are a great variety of manufacturers in New England, small manufacturers making such articles as latch needles, we will say, and cutlery, and other things. Have those men had any means of knowing that there are hearings going on here? And if they have not, can I get definite information whereby I can inform them and have them come here in order to have them?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator from Colorado tells me that that is his schedule and that they have been before him day after day. I can only refer to the schedules before the subcommittee of which I am a member.

I want to say to the Senator from New Hampshire that we expect to continue all next week hearings and conferring with men who come to criticize particular schedules. We have been through nearly every schedule with representatives of the industry affected. We have sent for importers when the manufacturers have been with us. We have sent for the Government representatives when they were with us. We have been seeking to apply the written information that has already been published by means of the practical suggestions that can come to a small number of men sitting down in a room, conferring, rather than with the formality of hearing testimony. I want to say that I should be glad to have anybody in New England who is interested in these schedules communicate with us, in writing or orally.

Mr. GALLINGER. The reason I asked the question was that from my correspondence I judged that the persons writing me have felt that they would not have hearings; and they have been very insistent and clamorous for the committee to have public hearings, so that they might appear and present their case. That is the only object I had in view in asking the question.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have been trying for several days to get an opportunity, just for a few minutes, to explain the way in which our subcommittee is conducting hearings, and to let it be known by everybody and to invite people to appear. We have had at least 50 Members of the House come before us with their constituents; and all the members of the House understood it, Republicans and Democrats.

I thank the Senator for yielding to me. I had no idea of interrupting him for so long a time. I am sure the Senators upon the other side want to be fair in this matter, however, and I wanted to let you know that we are sitting down with every man who has a criticism and investigating the criticisms with that thoroughness which can not be had at a public meeting of 17.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I disagree with the conclusion of the Senator, because I think it could be done a great deal better by the full committee.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is where we differ.

Mr. SMOOT. The idea of putting the interests of this whole country in the case of one schedule whose invested capital is $400,000,000, with an annual pay roll of nearly that amount, in the hands of three men to decide the question as to what shall be its future, and these three men behind closed doors.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRISTOW. I want to ask a question of the Senator from Georgia, if I may. I agree that the same process is being gone through by the Finance Committee now that was followed by the Finance Committee four years ago. It seems to me exactly the same. I objected to it then, and I object to it now. What I want to inquire is, Why can not these subcommittees have their hearings printed, so that any Member of the Senate can have the advantage of them when the discussion of the bill comes up, as well as the individual members of the subcommittee?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We have not had a stenographer with us to take down all that is said. It would have been a source of gratification to me to have had one and to have furnished anything that came to us to anyone who wished it. They have, in nearly every instance, furnished us in writing practically everything they said. They have made a presentation of all the facts and then they have given us individually, by the personal conference, a more perfect comprehension of what they had put in writing.

Mr. BRISTOW. I understand. That is very valuable to the subcommittee. I believe it is more practical to handle it by subcommittees than by a committee of 17.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is the only way——

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator will excuse me, when each schedule is handled by a subcommittee, it seems to me the information which that subcommittee elicits ought to be for the use of the Senate, and not solely for the use of the subcommittee. My objection is that these proceedings which the subcommittees are holding will not be of any use to Members of the Senate who have not the good fortune to be members of the Finance Committee or of a subcommittee.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The briefs or written arguments we have, and they are ready to be furnished to any Senator who would like to have them. The oral explanations really are to make us comprehend the written arguments, so that we can write more correctly any modification we may wish to make in the bill.

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator will pardon me, I know he wants to be fair, and I have great confidence in the Senator, but he will realize how important we feel it is to us to have exactly the same explanation available for our use that the Senator himself as a member of the subcommittee is getting; and that is the weakness of the resistance to hearings. I do not want hearings that will prolong the bill into the summer; I want to get away as quickly as anybody; nor will any one man read anything like the hearings before any one of the subcommittees; but they are books of reference and there are special items which interest every Senator whose constituents are interested. All the information that the committee has the advantage of should be published, so that any Senator may avail himself of that information.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That would be impossible; certainly as to the past evidence. So far as I am concerned, I would have been glad to have had every conversation and every conference we have had taken down in shorthand, if it had been suggested earlier that any Senator would like to have it. I really thought there was so much more already printed than any Senator would examine that we were merely being helped by the oral conference to know just how to make modifications.

For instance, we have a written brief pointing out that putting indigo on the free list is not sufficient, that alizarin and anthracene ought to be on the free list; and not only ought they to be on the free list, but that the dyes derived therefrom ought to be on it. We have a brief on that subject which is elaborate.

Parties interested come before us and point out the sections covering the subject and explain their briefs. We have a Government expert present who aids our investigation, and we seek the help of both for the further study of the question.

Mr. SMOOT. I have received hundreds of letters from all parts of the United States, the writers claiming to have received letters from Representatives of their districts in which they answered letters in protest of the tariff bill. On receipt of the letter protesting against items in the bill the answer from the Representative was something like this:

"Your letter received. I am sorry that your protest did not come earlier. If it had, no doubt the change could have been made; but now that the Democratic caucus has passed upon the bill it is impossible to change it. However, if you can get your Senator to change it, I am assured that the Members of the House of Representatives will not object."

Mr. President, are these protestants to be treated in the same way by the Senate? We will see when the bill is reported from the committee.

I had so much to say to-day, Mr. President, that I do not know where to begin now, as my time is about expended. Senators on the other side talk as if there was no necessity for hearings. They point to the information contained in the handbook that was issued by the Ways and Means Committee of the House, sometimes called the Democratic tariff bible. From a casual examination I find that if the information in that handbook is to be followed by your party as a basis for tariff rates the result would be absolutely ruinous to certain industries, for the information is not true.

Take paragraph 285, linoleum and corticine, and all other fabrics for coverings for floors. The handbook says that there is a production in this country of $108,731,948. That is not true, Mr. President. There is a production of only $24,176,224.

What are the facts? They have taken the production of all the tablecloth and put it into Schedule J. The very figures ought to have shown any man in the House of Representatives that they were false. It is stated that the unit value of production is 13 cents per square yard. There is not a man who does not know that could not be if it were linoleum. Yet they recommend a rate based upon this kind of information.

Then they say that the exports of this item are $353,544. Mr. President, there is not a dollar of export. The export was all table oilcloth, and falls in Schedule I instead of Schedule J. This is the class of information that is given in the handbook, and Congress is asked to act upon it.

Mr. President, this is importers' day. The importers have their innings, and the Halls of Congress are daily filled with them. I met the other morning a manufacturer of steel buttons. The wording covering this particular item is taken from Schedule N and placed in Schedule C and is added to so that it includes not only steel trouser buttons, but every form of metal buttons, and the wording used will lead to endless suits. This manufacturer happened to meet one of the importers just coming from the subcommittee, and he said to him, "Have you noticed the wording of that particular item? There certainly is a mistake in it, and I am going before the subcommittee and see if I can not have it changed." The importer said, "You need not try. There is no mistake; I wrote it myself."

Mr. REED. Mr. President, it would be interesting now to know the name of the importer.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President; I do not yield at this time. I suppose if there is any desire on the part of the Senator to know the name, the subcommittee will know the importers who have been before them, and they can find it out and give the information to the Senator.

Mr. REED. It is interesting to know whether any importer wrote that schedule.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have no doubt the statement is true, and if we have these hearings we are asking for you will find out whether they did or not.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsiu [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] wants to speak upon his amendment, and I think he is entitled to the floor. I have not even started to cover what I wanted to say, but I feel that it is my duty to yield to the Senator.

I will say just one word, and then close, Mr. President. I do not want to be discourteous to the Senator from Missouri, but the general debate must end at 3 o'clock.

Mr. REED. The Senator need not apologize.

Mr. SMOOT. Otherwise I would yield to the Senator willingly for any question that he might wish to ask.

Mr. President, who is rejoicing over the prospect of the passage of this bill? Not the American manufacturer or the American laborer. England is rejoicing; Germany is rejoicing; France is rejoicing; every foreign country is rejoicing. I want to say to the Senators upon the other side of this Chamber I have a collection of articles from all these countries showing how their manufacturers are preparing to invade the American market. Remember, every additional dollar imported means that much less for the American laborer to produce. I am not a calamity howler. There never was a time in the history of the country when you could put your tariff rates into force with as little disturbance to business as the present. Prosperity is almost universal. The cost of everything is high all over the world. In England, in Germany, in France, and in every civilized country men are well employed. There is a demand for goods, and they command a high price. I hope to see this condition of affairs continue, but I know it will not do so forever. It may for one, two, three, or four years; but I say to my Democratic brethren now that whenever the time comes that prosperity ceases in Europe and hard times are the universal condition in the world, as was the case in 1893, the foreigner, before he closes his business, is going to invade the American market, and then is the time when our workingmen will be out of employment. Whether this condition will occur next year or the year after I am not prepared to say, but I do know when it comes the result will be the same as it was in 1893 and your party will be retired from power for another quarter of a century.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the discussion has covered a wide range and has been very interesting. Much of it, however, would have better application after the bill has been considered by the committee and reported. I should like to bring the Senate back now for a few minutes to the consideration of the pending motion, which proposes to refer the bill to the Committee on Finance with instructions.

Mr. President, I want to say at the outset that I can not join with my colleagues upon this side in sweeping criticism of the manner in which the members of the Finance Committee are now proceeding, because, Mr. President, it is a matter of tariff history that the majority members of the present Finance Committee are engaged in doing exactly what the majority members of the Finance Committee did four years ago under Republican control. They are conducting hearings in secret; that is, they are conducting hearings that are not open to the public. There are no representatives of the press present, and opportunity to be heard is granted only to those who are invited in by the majority members of the Finance Committee. This is just as hearings were conducted under the Aldrich régime. Four years ago the Payne-Aldrich bill, after being in the possession of, not the Finance Committee, but the Republican members of the Finance Committee, for 48 hours, behind locked doors, was reported back to the Senate with something like 600 amendments. And I remember standing on this floor then and protesting against that procedure.

Mr. President, the Democratic majority of the Committee on Finance is now engaged in conducting like hearings, as I understand it. And I apprehend that when the bill is reported back to the Senate for its consideration it will come with the amendments and corrections which the majority, as a result of those hearings, believe ought to be made to the bill as it passed the House.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I only desire the opportunity to correct the Senator in a slight extent. The newspaper men are not excluded at our hearings downstairs. I have myself invited them to be present. Everyone is welcome who wants to come. Only three of us are doing the work; we are asking the questions and trying to narrow the information down.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am very happy, Mr. President, to hear that and to accept the correction of the Senator from Georgia. I differ with him when he says that it is only a slight correction. I think it is an important correction. I think it tremendously important that all legislative committee hearings should be open to the public. And I am glad to know that the Democratic majority of the Finance Committee in conducting hearings upon the tariff bill at this time—although they be somewhat limited hearings—are permitting representatives of the press to attend. I consider that a most significant and important departure.

Mr. President, I have but a few moments in which to submit some observations before the time for general debate expires. If I have not concluded in 10 minutes, I shall ask the presiding officer to recognize me to make a slight amendment pro forma, in order that I may speak for 10 minutes additional upon it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator that my understanding of the agreement was that the 10-minute order should not begin until 3 o'clock.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think it does.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator will have 10 minutes afterwards.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. At that time I will speak upon my pending amendment. So that allows me in all 20 minutes, and I think I can conclude in that time.

Mr. President, with the difference, then, that the Democratic majority of the Finance Committee have granted permission to representatives of the press to attend these hearings, the proceedings at this time are exactly what they were four years ago.

Indeed, Mr. President, as I have traced the history of the various tariff bills, public hearings have been conducted by the Ways and Means Committee first in the House, with both parties on the committee present. Such hearings were always held in advance of the introduction of the bill.

Complaint has been made that hearings upon the pending bill have been held prior to its introduction. That is true. So the hearings on the Payne-Aldrich bill were held prior to the introduction of the bill by Mr. PAYNE in the House. The hearings upon that bill began months before it was introduced in the House of Representatives. The testimony filled some 10 printed volumes, and was taken before the bill was ever introduced. The bill was introduced——

Mr. STONE. Was that hearing held by the Republican members of the committee?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; all of these printed hearings, of which we may obtain the different sets——

Mr. STONE. I have a set.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Were before the full committee. I was a member of the Ways and Means Committee when the McKinley bill was framed. We began our hearings in December. They were public, open hearings. They were held in the presence of all the members of that committee—Democratic as well as Republican members—and an opportunity was given for cross-examination freely by the representatives of the different political parties upon that committee. And all the hearings from that time down to this have been held in exactly the same way—before the bill was introduced. On the Wilson bill, which followed the McKinley bill, that was the fact. On the Dingley bill, which followed the Wilson bill, the hearings were held in the same way and were completed before the bill was introduced.

The same was true of the Payne bill. The hearings were held in the open. Both parties as represented upon the Ways and Means Committee were present. They had an opportunity to cross-examine everybody who appeared. Then, after the hearings were completed, the bill was framed, and on the 17th of March Mr. PAYNE——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. When did the hearings begin?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The hearings began November 10, 1908, and were completed before the bill was introduced. The same has been true of every tariff bill.

Mr. President, it was my impression that the McKinley committee had been more open in its proceedings than subsequent committees. But when I examined the record of the various tariff bills I found that the procedure of the Ways and Means Committee has been almost identical in the case of every tariff bill from 1890 down to the present time.

Furthermore, I find that the course of the Senate Finance Committee has been equally consistent. After the bill has been messaged over from the House it has been the practice to refer it to the Finance Committee. And I find no record anywhere of public hearings by the Senate Finance Committee. Such hearings as they have granted were held by the majority members. And, as I say, I do not find any printed record of them. In the debate occasional reference is made to them by way of criticism. Senators will remember that we had that sort of criticism four years ago on the Payne-Aldrich bill. I recall that Democratic Senators rose here and complained, and I did myself, because Senator Aldrich was conducting secluded hearings on that bill. And I remember that Senator Bailey defended that proceeding, stating that it was exactly what all other parties had done and citing specifically the case of the Wilson bill, which the Democratic members of the Senate Committee on Finance revised in private sessions.

Mr. STONE. I do not want to interrupt the Senator, but I should like to have him put in his remarks the statement that while the majority Members are holding these hearings the minority Members are having hearings also with the same sort of assistance—Government expert assistance.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not understand that the minority Members of the committee are holding hearings as members of the committee. I am free to say that the Committee on Finance has granted me an assistant to aid me in my work upon the bill.

Mr. STONE. And the other minority Members.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Now, Mr. President, I am willing as a Republican to take advantage of——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to state to the Senator that I think he is entirely correct when he says that all the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee have been before the bill was framed. The hearings have been with a view to assisting them in framing the bill. I think the Senator is further correct in saying that the Finance Committee of the Senate has never had hearings upon these tariff bills, with one single exception. The only exception that I know to that rule was with reference to the House schedule bills last year. Then, as the Senator knows, there was one party in power in the House and another in the Senate, and the House committee did not give hearings on the schedule bills because of the recent hearings upon the Payne-Aldrich bill. But when the bill came over here, a different party being in power in this body and having a majority upon the Finance Committee, they insisted upon adopting a rule that the Finance Committee had never before adopted, and had hearings before that committee.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him a moment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. I rose before the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] did to call the Senator's attention to the fact that we had hearings on all those schedule bills that came over from the other House. Here is a printed hearing on Schedule E [exhibiting].

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is true.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is on sugar, molasses, sirup, and so forth, and on every bill that came over we had public hearings.

Mr. SIMMONS. That was the first time the Finance Committee had ever had public hearings upon tariff bills to my knowledge.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I was tracing the history, Mr. President, of tariff revision, of general bills, and I think I stated the facts accurately.

The present proceeding is strikingly parallel to that of four years ago. The action of the present Democratic majority is no more unwarranted than the action of the then Republican majority. Nor can such unwarranted action then justify a wrong course at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 3 o'clock having arrived, the Chair recognizes the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I favor the motion for open public hearings before the full Committee on Finance in the presence of the representatives of both sides. I am opposed to excluding any of the members of any legislative committee from committee hearings. I believe that the appointees of both parties upon the committees that have charge of legislation have the right to be present. And, sir, I believe that it is in the interest of the public that they should be present. I believe that the doors of committees should stand open; I believe that the representatives of the press should be permitted to attend these meetings. I think that even the caucuses of political parties, when they deal through their representatives with the public business, should be open to the public. I can not believe that it is in the interest of the public to transact business affecting all the people in private or secret conferences, for surely all legislative business is public business.

And so, Mr. President, I am in favor of having this bill referred to the Committee on Finance with the instruction that it shall proceed to hold open hearings upon the subjects with which it deals.

As I say, I believe that proceedings before committees upon all legislation should be open to the public. And this is particularly true when we come to consideration of the tariff. It deals with great interests; it deals with interests that have had the benefit of special advantage; it deals with interests whose advantages are to be taken away from them altogether or are to be modified by the proposed bill. There is opportunity for misinformation if you permit only partial hearings. And if you conduct hearings before only a limited number of the committee, if you permit hearings where there may not be the widest publicity and the most searching cross-examination of those who appear, you may be misled, however honest your intentions. For your own protection those hearings should be open and in the presence of the opposition. They should not be under the suspicion which attaches to all secret and ex parte proceedings.

More than that, Mr. President, in a tariff bill there is opportunity for sectional advantage; there is opportunity within a single industry for advantage of one branch of that industry over another. There is no subject of legislation where there ought to be more searching investigation or wider publicity with no opportunity afforded for special favor to any branch of any industry.

Besides all this, Mr. President, every man who has sought for information from these printed tariff hearings has been forced to search through a mass of vague, unsubstantial matter of such a general nature as to prove very discouraging.

To determine the proper rate, whether it be a protective rate or a revenue rate, requires definite and exact information as to every industry affected.

To that end I have proposed an amendment which will require the Committee on Finance to compel those appearing before the committee to protest against the duties proposed in the pending bill to answer certain specific questions.

These questions are as follows:

1. What is the nature and use of the commodity which you produce?
2. What are the raw materials used in its production?

3. What is the amount of the production of this commodity in this country?
4. What is the amount of the consumption of this commodity in this country?
5. How many concerns are engaged in the manufacture of the commodity under consideration?
6. Who are the principal producers?
7. What are the ruling market prices of this commodity in this country?
8. What are the ruling market prices of this commodity in competing countries?
9. What is the total cost of production per unit of product in this country?
10. What is the total cost of production per unit of product in competing countries?
11. What is the percentage of the labor cost to the total cost of a unit of product in this country?
12. What is the percentage of the labor cost to the total cost of a unit of product in competing foreign countries?
13. What is the cost of transportation to the principal markets in this country from the principal point of production in this country?
14. What is the cost of transportation to the principal markets in this country from the principal points of production in competing foreign countries?
15. What part of the existing duty represents the difference in the cost of production between this and competing foreign countries?
16. What part of the existing duty represents the profit of the American manufacturer?

The answers to these questions will furnish the committee and the country with detailed information, without which it is wholly impossible to know whether duties are too high or too low. A tariff investigation should be conducted upon scientific lines.

It matters not whether it is the aim to fix duties at a point where they will be fair to the manufacturer, fair to the labor which he employs, and at the same time fair to the consumer; it matters not if the bill is to be framed solely as a revenue measure and against the principle of protection, this information is vital.

Without the facts which the answers to these questions will furnish the committee can not possibly know whether the duty fixed on any product is a protective duty or solely a revenue duty.

If the duty is a protective duty, the committee can not know whether the rate is excessively protective or not.

If the duty should be so low as to have eliminated all of the protective elements of the duty, then the committee can not, without this information, know whether the duty is fixed at the point where it would produce the largest measure of revenue possible.

If it is aimed to reduce the duty to a level that will maintain a sharp competition between the domestic producer and the foreign producer, then the data which the answers to these questions will furnish the committee will enable it to make the duty what is termed a competitive duty.

Limit the open hearings, if you wish; I am not working for delay, but merely seeking the truth. That is what we want, Mr. President. I perhaps do not agree with many of my colleagues. There are some men so strongly partisan, Mr. President, that they are willing to see the worst possible bill enacted; a bill that shall bring ruin and disaster, a bill that shall not be even just to the 90,000,000 people who are the consumers; a bill that shall bear with great hardship on the millions of men and women who are wage earners; a bill that shall oppress and injure the hundreds of millions of capital invested—there are some men, I say, Mr. President, who would rejoice to see such a bill passed; in the hope that it would create a political revolution and force a return to the high rates of the Payne-Aldrich law.

Mr. President, I am a Republican. I want to see a protective bill; but I want it so moderately protective that it will fairly measure, as best we can with our imperfect information, the difference between the cost of producing the thing upon this side of the ocean and producing it on the other side, so that that difference will be justly equalized by the tariff. Then the laborer will be protected. That is my concern; that is what I want to see. I do not want to see a bill passed by you Democrats so bad that because of the radical changes wrought depression and disaster will follow it, bringing back into power the men who represent the other extreme of tariff, the highest possible duties. I do not want to see the American people forever ground between the representatives of a tariff so low that it will oppress our labor and the representatives of a protective tariff so high that it will burden and oppress the consumers of the country.

I appealed to my Republican colleagues four years ago to consent to such a reduction as would measure the difference in the cost of production here and abroad. If they had been satisfied with just and reasonable rates, we would have been able to maintain them.

Mr. President, I have exhausted my time, but not my subject.

Before I yield the floor I ask leave to print in connection with my remarks a signed editorial which I recently published in La Follette's Weekly. It bears directly upon the subject under discussion and I venture to suggest that it may be found of interest.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

DEMOCRATIZING THE SENATE.

On Tuesday, April 8, the Senate Democrats in caucus adopted a resolution which it is hoped marks the beginning of an important reform. It provides (1) that a majority of a committee may call the committee together at any time for the consideration of any pending bill; (2) that a majority of the majority members of a committee may name subcommittees to consider pending bills and report the same for action by the full committee; (3) that a majority of the majority members of any committee may name committees to confer with House conferees on any bill upon which the two Houses have disagreed.

The standing committees of the Senate are selected under a plan which enables a few men to control the action of the Senate on legislation. For years these rules have been in existence. From time to time I have criticized this plan of control upon the floor of the Senate and editorially in La Follette's. I can not better describe the method through which this mastery of legislation has been centered in the hands of a few Senators than by quoting from my discussion of the Lorimer case May 26, 1911:

"Sir, I believe the time is near at hand when we will change the practice of naming the regular or standing committees of the Senate.

"It is un-American. It is undemocratic. It has grown into an abuse. It typifies all of the most harmful practices which have led an enlightened and aroused public judgment to decree the destruction of the caucus, convention, and delegate system of party nominations.

"Under the present system of choosing the standing committees of the United States Senate, a party caucus is called. A chairman is authorized to appoint a committee on committees. The caucus adjourns. The committee on committees is thereafter appointed by the chairman of the caucus. It proceeds to determine the committee assignments of Senators. This places the selection of the membership of the standing committees completely in the hands of a majority of the committee on committees, because in practice the caucus ratifies the action of the committee and the Senate ratifies the action of the caucus.

"See now what has happened. The people have delegated us to represent them in the Senate. The Senate, in effect, has delegated its authority to party caucuses upon either side.

"The party caucus delegates its authority to a chairman to select a committee on committees. The committee on committees largely defer to the chairman of the committee on committees in the final decision as to committee assignments.

"The standing committees of the Senate, so selected, Mr. President, determine the fate of all bills; they report, shape, or suppress legislation practically at will.

"Hence the control of legislation, speaking in a broad sense, has been delegated and redelegated until responsibility to the public has been so weakened that the public can scarcely be said to be represented at all."

Under this system the leader of the majority practically controls committee assignments of the majority membership of the Senate; and in like manner the minority leader controls the committee assignments of the minority membership. When the Senate was Democratic, Mr. Gorman directed the majority committee assignments, and thus controlled legislation. When the Senate was Republican, Mr. Aldrich directed the majority committee assignments, and thus controlled legislation.

But the system does not stop here. To make this control of legislation water-tight, the trusted lieutenants assigned to the chairmanship of the committees have always exercised authority (1) to determine when a committee should meet; (2) to appoint subcommittees for the consideration of all bills referred to the committee by the Senate; and (3) to name the conferees to be appointed by the presiding officer of the Senate.

Thus the chairman through his power to call or refusal to call meetings of committees indirectly controls committee action or nonaction upon bills. He can select a "safe" subcommittee to suppress or hamstring measures to which the system is opposed. And finally, through his ability to select conferees, he exercises an especially insidious and despotic power over legislation, because the conferees can in conference radically change a measure passed by the Senate; and when reported back to that body for final action their report, under a rule which still further augments this power, is not subject to amendment by the Senate, but must be accepted or rejected as a whole. This latter rule is a most vicious one. Often the Senate is confronted with the problem of accepting bad provisions in order to secure good provisions or of rejecting good provisions in order to defeat bad ones which have been incorporated in conference.

But this proposed reform by the Democratic majority does not go to the root of the matter. The action of committees, subcommittees, and conference committees on all bills is conducted in executive session—that is to say, in secret session. As a member of the Senate I have again and again protested against the secret action of congressional committees upon public business, and against the business of Congress being taken into secret party caucuses and there disposed of by party rule. I have maintained at all times my right as a public servant to discuss in open Senate and elsewhere, publicly, all legislative proceedings, whether originating in the executive sessions of committees or behind the closed doors of caucuses and conferences.

Evil and corruption thrive best in the dark. Many, if not most, of the acts of legislative dishonesty which have made scandalous the proceedings of Congress and State legislatures could never have reached the first stage had they not been conceived and practically consummated in secret conferences, secret caucuses, secret sessions of committees, and then carried through the legislative body with little or no discussion.

The rules of the House of Representatives and of the Senate should be so changed as to require caucuses and committees to make and keep for public inspection a record of every act of such organizations involving the public business.

In a great body like the Congress of the United States nearly all legislation is controlled by committees. The action of a subcommittee has great weight with the committee. The sanction of a committee is practically controlling with Congress. Members of Congress and the Senate must, in large measure, depend for the details of legislation upon the committees appointed for the purpose of perfecting legislation. As the business of the country grows, and the subjects of legislation multiply, so committee action upon bills becomes more and more important.

We spend large sums of money to print the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in order that the public may be made acquainted with the conduct of their business, and then we transact the important part of the business behind the locked doors of committee rooms. The public believes that the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD tells the complete story, when it is in reality only the final chapter.

By its caucus action the Democratic majority promises a partial reform. It should make this first step secure by incorporating it as a part of the Senate's code of procedure. The mere adoption of resolutions limiting the power of the chairmen of committees can readily be modified or reversed by subsequent caucus action. Once a part of the standing rules of the Senate the record will be made, and this arbitrary power will never again be restored to the chairmen of committees.

But, more than this, the rules of the Senate must be so changed as to provide for the election of members of committees by the Senate, pursuant to a direct primary conducted by each party organization under regulations prescribed by Senate rules.

The chairmen of the committees should be elected by a record vote of the members of such committees.

The conferees on all bills should be elected by a record vote of the members of the committees reporting such bills.

A permanent record should be made of the action of caucuses, standing committees, and conference committees upon all matters affecting legislation.

All caucus proceedings touching legislation, and the proceedings of subcommittees, committees, and conference committees should be open to the public.

Then, and not until then, will the Senate be truly democratized.

ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE subsequently said: Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has called my attention to the fact that there is one instance in the tariff history of the last 50 years in which the Senate Committee on Finance held open public hearings on a general tariff bill aside from those held by the Finance Committee on the special schedules a year ago. That was upon the Mills bill of 1888. The Senator has kindly furnished me with a report which I was unable to get from the Senate library myself and which contains those hearings. In that report, made by Senator Aldrich, I find the following:

> For weeks we have patiently listened to persons employed in the various pursuits and from every section, and with doors open to all we have received the advice and counsel of the men whose labor, enterprise, and skill have made the United States the foremost industrial country of the world, and not one person has appeared to approve or to advocate the bill under consideration.

I had called for exactly that information and received this report:

> So far as the records of the Senate Library show, there were no hearings on the Walker tariff, the Morrill tariff, the Morrison Act, or the Mills bill; and there are no documents showing hearings on any of these measures.

This was upon the Mills bill, and to that extent the report was in error. That mistake is chargeable neither to my own secretary, who was dispatched to the Senate Library to secure the information, nor to the Senate librarian, but to an omission in the index which misled those who were making the search for me. The fact remains, however, that upon no tariff bill which became a law were Senate hearings ever accorded.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I only desire to say to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], with respect to the interrogatories that he proposes to ask in his amendment shall be submitted to the industries asking protection, that after conference with members of the Finance Committee I can say to the Senator that it is our purpose, whatever may be the result of the controversy now before the Senate, to send those interrogatories to the representative of every industry that has filed a brief with us or who has appeared before the committee asking for a duty upon their product, with the request that they will cause those interrogatories to be answered under oath and send the committee their answers.

Mr. President, when the Senator from Utah was upon his feet——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Will the Senator permit just a brief interruption there? I know his time is limited.

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If we can not have those questions answered in any other way except in writing by the interests that are seeking to maintain existing duties, I shall be glad to have them answered in that way; but there is a world of difference between their being answered in that way and the representatives of such industries appearing before the committee and being cross-examined upon their answers.

Mr. SIMMONS. I simply wanted to state to the Senator what was our purpose with reference to it.

When the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] was about to close his speech, he referred to the Democratic handbook, so-called, and took occasion to criticize very severely some of the data contained in that handbook, which I thought a little foreign to the subject, and I wish to call the Senator's attention to the subject which he selected for special animadversion, that of linoleum. The Senator said, as a basis of his criticism of the data furnished in this handbook upon that subject, that the book showed that there were imported into this country $108,000,000 worth of this product.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. I thought the Senator must be mistaken as to his facts. I tried to interrupt him, but he was so excited that he could not see except upon the other side of the Chamber.

Mr. SMOOT. So earnest, the Senator means.

Mr. SIMMONS. Just a moment. Immediately after the Senator had taken his seat, I went to his desk and asked him if he meant $108,000,000, and the Senator said to me that he did.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator if that is what he asked, I certainly misunderstood him.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is what the Senator said upon the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. I think not, Mr. President.

Mr. SIMMONS. That this book showed that there were produced in this country $108,000,000 worth of this product.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think I said there was $108,000,000 worth produced. I said there were 108,000,000 square yards produced in this country.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; the Senator said "dollars," because I went and asked if he said "dollars," and the Senator told me that he said "dollars," and insisted that he was correct.

Mr. SMOOT. I will now call the Senator's attention to the facts as they are. If I said "dollars," it was a slip of the tongue. The Senator ought to know that it was a slip of the tongue, because I followed the statement immediately by giving the unit of value, 13 cents.

Mr. SIMMONS. I went to the Senator to find out whether it was a slip of the tongue.

Mr. SMOOT. I spoke of the mistakes of the handbook as a reason why we ought to have hearings.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator has in his mind what he said upon the floor, the Senator, as I understood him, said that the production of linoleum in this country amounted to $20,000,000, or somewhere around that amount.

Mr. SMOOT. The production of linoleum amounts to 24,176,224 square yards.

Mr. SIMMONS. I simply wanted to call attention to the fact that the data contained in this book conformed to the statement—the revised and corrected statement—of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I know it conforms to the statement, and I say that the figures in the handbook are wrong.

Mr. STONE. Does the Senator mean the statement he made was wrong?

Mr. SMOOT. No; the statement the handbook makes is wrong. I say that instead of the production of linoleum being 108,000,000 square yards it was but 24,176,224 square yards, and if the Senator will ascertain the amount of square yards of linoleum produced in the United States and add it to the amount of square yards of tablecloth produced in the United States he will find they both amount to 108,000,000 square yards as reported in the Democratic handbook.

Mr. SIMMONS. And not "dollars"?

Mr. SMOOT. And not "dollars"; but I can tell the Senator exactly what it would amount to in dollars.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator from Utah had read the heading to that paper he would have seen that it covers linoleum, corticene, and other fabrics or coverings for floors.

Mr. SMOOT. For floors, yes; but tablecloths do not cover floors.

Mr. SIMMONS. It does not say that tablecloths cover floors.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; but it takes tablecloth to make the yardage. And tablecloth is found in Schedule I instead of Schedule J. The book is wrong.

Mr. SIMMONS. There is where it ought to be.

Mr. SMOOT. I say so, too; but the book endeavors to put it in Schedule I.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have carefully refrained from discussing tariff matters during the consideration of the pending motion to refer the bill to the committee. I apprehend that we will have a good many weeks in which to discuss the bill after it comes from the committee, and so I have no disposition to take a single moment to-day in any observations on the general questions involved in the proposed legislation, but I was interested a little while ago in the statement made by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] that the subcommittee of which he was the chairman was giving consideration——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am not the chairman. The Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON] is the chairman.

Mr. GALLINGER. But the Senator is a member of the subcommittee.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am just one of the working members.

Mr. GALLINGER. As I was about to say, I was interested in the Senator's statement that the subcommittee of which the Senator is a member was giving consideration to the cotton schedule. My people are greatly interested in that schedule. I am gratified that the Senator has heard some representatives of the cotton mills in New Hampshire, and I am particularly gratified to learn, not from the Senator or his subcommittee, but from other sources, that at least one item in that bill is to be attended to in the way that the representatives of that great industry have requested. I hope that is true.

Now, Mr. President, what I desire to do at this time——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me a moment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think the subcommittee has reached any final conclusion, but each member of it has talked with perfect freedom with everybody who came before them.

While I am on my feet, I should like just to take a moment of time to say that if any Senator on the other side, or on this side, has a constituent or constituents whom he wishes to bring or to send before either of the subcommittees we will be glad to have them come; we will give them a hearing, and if they want their statements reported, we will have a stenographer present and have them reported; and then, if the Senate approves, we will have them published whenever it is so desired.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have no doubt that is true, and I apprehend some of my constituents may present themselves before the subcommittee in due time.

The Senator from Georgia suggested that the subcommittee were giving particular consideration to the higher grades of cotton manufactured in New England, rather than to the coarser grades manufactured in the South. I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that a good many of the coarser grades are produced in the North as well as in the South, and that even the manufacturers of the coarser grades are somewhat disturbed. For the purpose of showing that, Mr. President, I desire to have the Secretary read the telegram which I send to the desk from one of our large manufacturing concerns in New England.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

[Telegram.]

CONCORD, N. H., April 30, 1913.

Senator JACOB H. GALLINGER,
Capitol, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We have been informed that the prevailing impression of people at Washington is that New England manufacturers are, as a whole, fairly well satisfied with the proposed new tariff. Such is not the case, for many are apprehensive of a serious loss in trade. We beg to call your attention to certain provisions of the tariff bill which are of vital importance to us. The lowering of the duties on manufactured goods injures all cotton mills in this State, which injury we share with other mills. The proposed duty upon dyestuffs will work additional harm to our business. Our mills, after a period of from 50 to 60 years running on print cloths and other coarse fabrics, have been thoroughly reconstructed, and due to changes in the condition of the cloth market are now making finer goods, such as striped shirtings and chambrays. We are specializing upon a fast-colored chambray which has met with the approval of the trade, since it is an excellent fabric and of medium price. Our colors are obtained from algol, alizarin, natural and artificial, and dyes derived from alizarin or from anthracine, which under the present tariff, paragraph 487, are free, but under paragraph 6 of the new tariff would be subject to 10 per cent ad valorem, or even 30 per cent ad valorem in European goods against which we compete. These colors are used very largely in Europe. Those colors are free, and if in addition to the reduction in the import duty on the finished goods we have to suffer a penalty of 30 per cent ad valorem on the dyes, our efforts to compete would be hopeless. We wish, if possible, the dyestuffs above referred to to remain on the free list, or if this is impossible to add "and dyes derived from alizarin and from anthracine" to paragraph 6. We respectfully urge you to give this matter your thoughtful attention.

HARRY J. RICKETSON,
Agent Suncook Mills.

Mr. GALLINGER. I also ask to have read a telegram from another large manufacturing concern in New Hampshire which manufactures cotton goods.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested, in the absence of objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

[Telegram.]

NEW MARKET, N. H., May 1, 1913.

Senator J. H. GALLINGER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Believe Underwood bill in present form extremely detrimental to interests of this corporation and of all cotton mills in New England.

NEW MARKET MANUFACTURING CO.,
GEORGE E. SPOFFORD, Agent.

Mr. GALLINGER. I also ask to have read another telegram from a large cotton mill in my State.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read, as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

[Telegram.]

SOMERSWORTH, N. H., April 30, 1913.

Hon. JACOB H. GALLINGER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The lack of protection on five-counts cotton goods will indirectly seriously affect the coarse-goods mills of New Hampshire. The prospect of such conditions is already throwing employees out of work in our plant. We believe the Underwood schedule should be modified.

GREAT FALLS MANUFACTURING CO.,
PHILIP H. STILES, Agent.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have had similar telegrams from other cotton-manufacturing concerns in my State. I remember two from the city of Nashua which I have mislaid. I simply put these in the RECORD for the purpose of getting them to the subcommittee for their consideration. I ask that they be referred to the Committee on Finance, and I trust that the Senator from Georgia, in the kindness of his heart, will take them under serious consideration, both as regards the duty on cotton cloth of the various kinds and also the matter of alizarin and other dyes in which our manufacturers are greatly interested.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am glad to say to the Senator from New Hampshire that I have heard manufacturers from Massachusetts and New Hampshire and Maine and Connecticut and Rhode Island discuss these dyes, and, not speaking for the committee but for myself, I do not believe in putting a tax on them. I think they ought to remain on the free list.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, that information is extremely gratifying. I will simply add that I have received perhaps thousands of letters, certainly many hundreds of letters, and numerous telegrams from people in my State begging that public hearings may be given on this bill, which it will be readily understood affects their interests very materially; and I am hopeful that, when the vote is taken, the amendment proposing that the bill shall be referred to the committee and that public hearings shall be held will receive a majority vote of the Senate. Of course, if it does not, we will do the best we can with our Democratic friends, who, I apprehend, will listen patiently to us at least, whether they grant our requests or not. I will repeat that, so far as the discussion of the bill and its merits or demerits are concerned, I will patiently await the time when it can properly be discussed.

Mr. NEWLANDS and Mr. LODGE addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nevada.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, like the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], I believe in public hearings——

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator from Nevada will permit me, I promised to yield for a moment to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] before I took my seat.

Mr. NEWLANDS. My time has commenced, and I should like to go on.

Mr. LODGE. I merely wished to call attention to a report. I was not going to make a speech.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Senator can have his own time, I imagine, to do that.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from New Hampshire promised to yield to me, but the Senator from Nevada was recognized before the Senator from New Hampshire had an opportunity to do so.

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the Senator simply wishes to present a formal matter, I will yield.

Mr. LODGE. I shall get it in at some time.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, like the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], I believe in public hearings. I am opposed to proceedings behind closed doors. I do not believe for a moment that the Democratic Party contemplates the latter procedure, and for that we have the assurance of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], who proposes practically through the action of the committee to assure the collection of the information sought to be ascertained by the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin. We must have party solidarity and we must have party action, and, so far as I am concerned, the Finance Committee has my confidence, and I propose to follow its lead with reference to the method of procedure, with confidence that it will meet the just expectations of the Senate regarding hearings. If, however, later I should find that it is not doing so, I will exercise my independent judgment with reference to its methods.

Mr. President, I wish to say a few words regarding the sugar question, which has been discussed here. I wish to clarify a little the situation, for, unfortunately, we have drifted into a condition of excitement regarding it. What is the question? The question is whether at the end of three years, a temporary reduction being meanwhile made of about one-third in the tariff duty upon sugar, sugar shall drift entirely to the free list or whether it shall remain on the dutiable list but with a very large reduction of duty, such duty not exceeding the average of the duties now imposed by the Underwood bill upon articles on the dutiable list, namely, a duty of about 25 per cent. This question does not involve a duty that will be of advantage to the refiners, because the bill carries no differential duty on refined sugars, and the only question that is before this body is as to whether a reduction from the duty fixed by the Underwood bill at the end of three years to the free list will work a serious injury to the sugar industry, and whether or not a duty not greater than the average duties in the Underwood bill of 25 per cent shall remain upon sugar with a view of maintaining that industry as a live industry. The question is not whether we shall continue the Sugar Trust, or the benefit of the sugar refiners, or the advantages of the sugar factories, but the question is whether we shall, by fixing a moderate revenue duty, such as is imposed on other food and agricultural products, enable the cane and beet sugar production to continue. That is the only question.

We find that upon the various agricultural products which become part of the food of the Nation the Underwood bill imposes certain duties. It imposes duties upon wheat, upon oats, and upon other farm products—eggs, butter, and things of that kind. It is a duty, I believe, that is reduced, but still a duty of from 10 to 15 per cent. So the Underwood bill already provides for a moderate revenue duty upon articles of food constituting the necessaries of life, and the question is whether the same treatment shall be accorded to another agricultural product, namely, cane and beets, from which sugar, an article of food, is produced.

We must consider this question not simply as a domestic question, but also as a question involving our insular possessions, involving Porto Rico, Hawaii, and the Philippine Islands, and also as involving Cuba, which, in a certain measure, is our ward, though not a part of our governmental or economic system.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. NEWLANDS. I can not submit to any interruptions.

Mr. SIMMONS. I simply want to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the bill does impose a duty on sugar beets.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes; upon beets though whose bulk prevents transportation and importation, but not upon sugar whose condensation in weight and value facilitates transportation and importation. Whoever heard of importing sugar beets? A duty on beets is worse than that other sham in this bill—a duty on wheat, no duty on flour.

How does this question involve the United States? First, it involves the admitted fact that the sugar industry in Louisiana will be absolutely destroyed by free sugar. Second, it involves the question of a serious crippling of the beet-sugar industry in the West, and its possible destruction. Third, it involves the question of the production of sugar in Hawaii, in the Philippine Islands, and in Porto Rico, in all of which the production has been largely stimulated by the admission of those countries within our tariff wall—so much so that estimating roughly the production of Porto Rico has increased from about 100,000 tons annually to nearly 500,000 tons; the production of Hawaii has increased from about 200,000 tons to about 500,000 tons; and the product of the Philippine Islands from about 50,000 tons to 200,000 tons; and since the Spanish War the production of Cuba, favored by a small reduction in our tariff duty of only 20 per cent, has increased from about 500,000 tons to 2,300,000 tons.

The consumption in this entire country is three and a half million tons. The United States proper and all of these islands combined, including Cuba, produce about 4,200,000 tons. So we can eliminate the entire world from our view, so far as sugar production is concerned, except our home region, our insular possessions, and the island of Cuba; and the question is whether we are going to sacrifice an industry in our own country which produces to-day, on our territory and soil, 1,000,000 tons, and in our insular possessions very nearly a million and a quarter tons, and give it absolutely over to Cuba, which has a capacity of production much in excess of the power of this country to absorb. For, recollect, Cuba is the nearest point of production; it is the cheapest point of production, surpassing in cheapness the production of the Philippine Islands, Hawaii, and Porto Rico. The freight is almost nothing. Its freight can be delivered for 10 cents a hundred pounds in New York; and when the Mississippi River is opened, as it will be, by an improved waterway system, it can deliver its freight right in the center of our country, at St. Louis, for 20 cents a hundred pounds; and when the Panama Canal is finished it can deliver its freight to San Francisco as cheaply as Hawaii itself.

So we propose to surrender a production of approximately 4,000,000 tons of sugar, consumed by the American people, to an island not a part of our governmental and economic system, increasing the production there and diminishing and perhaps destroying our production here.

Admitting that in the vast enterprises and industries of this country that will not have an appreciable effect upon our prosperity what will be the effect upon our dependencies?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The 10 minutes of the Senator from Nevada are up.

[Mr. NEWLANDS continued his remarks after the disposition of the motion to refer the tariff bill to the Finance Committee, as follows:]

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I also wish to supplement my remarks by a very few words regarding the democratization of the sugar industry.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not yield the floor, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana will state his point of order.

Mr. KERN. My point of order is that the Senate is operating under a unanimous-consent agreement which provided that immediately upon the vote being taken on the motion then pending the resolution in relation to the West Virginia coalfields inquiry should be proceeded with as the unfinished business.

Mr. GALLINGER. It has been laid before the Senate.

Mr. KERN. And I am calling for the regular order.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am not interfering at all with the unfinished business. It has been customary in the Senate to allow the widest range of debate upon every question, and I have never known that rule to be varied by calling any Member from the floor and prescribing to him a certain line of discussion. I repeat, I certainly am not interfering with the consideration of the resolution. My remarks will be brief, but I wish at this time to supplement something that I have already given expression to in the consideration of the question just disposed of.

I commented upon the fact, Mr. President, that the Democratic Party contemplates the democratization of the sugar industry. This tariff does not involve the question of a protective duty to the sugar refiner. It involves simply the question as to whether a moderate revenue duty not exceeding the average duty imposed by the Underwood bill shall be imposed upon sugar or whether sugar shall be put upon the free list, and I have yet to learn that it is undemocratic to argue the question as to whether an article shall be upon the free list or upon the dutiable list, where the duty is simply a revenue duty, and a moderate revenue duty at that.

I pointed out the fact, Mr. President, that our only rival in the production of sugar is Cuba. There are 18,000,000 tons of sugar annually produced in the world, one half of it beet sugar and the other half of it cane sugar. Every ton of beet sugar has been stimulated in production, either by a protective tariff duty or by a bounty. The result of the duties imposed by certain European countries, as well as our own, and of certain bounties paid for sugar production, has been that beet sugar has become the great rival of cane sugar, and that rivalry in the markets of the world has reduced the price of sugar from 10 cents a pound to from 4 to 5 cents a pound.

Now, the question is whether the Democratic Party is going to pursue a policy which may again raise the price of sugar by crippling the efficiency of beet sugar as a rival in the markets of the world. I have already shown that Cuba, since the Cuban War, has increased its production from 500,000 tons to 2,300,000 tons, and that during that time the entire continent of the United States, with its industry favored by a high protective duty, has increased its production through beet sugar less than 500,000 tons, and that during that very time Hawaii, inside of our tariff wall; the Philippine Islands, inside of our tariff wall; Porto Rico, inside of our tariff wall, and having the advantage over Cuba for a time of about 1¾ cents a pound, and later on of 1⅛ cents a pound, being the amount of the duty imposed upon Cuban importations—all of them combined have not increased the production as rapidly as has Cuba. It follows, therefore, conclusively that if Cuba, with a handicap during this entire period since the Cuban War of a duty imposed on its product of from 1¾ cents a pound down to 1⅛ cents a pound, has been able to increase its production more largely than the United States, Porto Rico, the Philippine Islands, and Hawaii combined, necessarily, when that handicap is removed,

Cuba will monopolize the production for the entire consumption of the United States, aggregating now three and a half million tons. Can anyone deny that reasoning, and are the American people prepared to face that fact?

Mr. President, we will assume that the United States can stand this, that Louisiana can turn her activities in other directions; that the great arid areas of the West, to which the production of the sugar beet has come as a special benefaction, can get along without the production of beets and can turn to other forms of production. The next question, then, is what will be the effect of our action upon our dependencies—the dependency of Porto Rico, the dependency of Hawaii, and the dependency of the Philippine Islands?

We acquired Hawaii as a part of our country just before the Spanish-American War. Her purpose in annexation was to get inside of our tariff wall and to relieve herself of the payment of a duty. In doing that she gained the advantage of adding to her price our tariff duty, but she suffered the disadvantage of coming under our industrial system, which meant a higher wage cost and a higher supply cost. She also had the disadvantage of absolutely surrendering to the Government of the United States the customs duties which she had been accustomed to collect, so that they form to-day a part of the national revenue and no part of the revenue of Hawaii.

During this time the production of Hawaii has been stimulated by the enhanced price which she has been able to get for her sugar. She not only availed herself of the ordinary production, but of stimulated production through irrigation, at an immense cost, and to-day she has a production of 500,000 tons annually, as against a previous production of 200,000 or 300,000 tons. Now, take down that tariff wall; put her upon an even basis with the island of Cuba—the Hawaiian Islands, 2,500 miles away from our Pacific coast and 6,000 miles away from the very center of our population, and Cuba at our very doors; the Hawaiian Islands, with a stimulated production, a costly, intensive production produced by irrigation, an expensive wage system, an increased cost system for its supplies, because she is within our protective tariff wall and compelled to pay protective prices for everything that she buys; deprived of the opportunity to get her labor in the markets of the world, deprived of the opportunity of getting her supplies in the markets of the world, with a natural production inferior to that of Cuba, enjoying not the same advantages either of soil or of climate, and what will become of the Hawaiian Islands production when Cuba, relieved of the necessity of paying 1⅛ cents tax upon its product, increases her annual production 500,000 tons more? What will then become of the Hawaiian Islands? To what industry can those islands turn? They have tried coffee and failed; they have stimulated the production of pineapples, and they get a small revenue from that industry; but can you point out any other production that the Hawaiian Islands are capable of? There is Cuba, with a richer soil, a better climate, a lower wage cost, a lower supply cost, and a lower freight cost, at the very door of the center of population of this country.

Then, recollect that the Hawaiian Islands will be less fortunate through annexation than by reason of a separate existence, for the very revenues of the customhouse that used to be in the possession of the islands themselves are now turned over to the Federal Treasury. They used to be able to go to China for their laborers. They are now prevented from doing so by our restrictive laws. They used to go to Japan for their laborers. Our Government, when it made its treaty with Japan, exacted the stipulation from the Japanese Government that it would restrict the immigration of its people to our territory.

Where will Hawaii look for the cheaper labor, which she will have to secure in order to compete with Cuba—Cuba, which has access to the markets of the world for its labor; Cuba, which has access to the markets of the world for its supplies; Cuba, having the advantage of its own revenue and customs duties to apply to its own development, and Hawaii deprived of them?

So it is with Porto Rico. Porto Rico is a little island, 100 miles long and 30 miles wide, with a population of 1,000,000, the most densely populated country—I was about to say in the world—with no capacity for an increase of its population by reason of its limited area as compared with Cuba, which at the time of the Cuban War had only 500,000 people in excess of Porto Rico, and has an area capable of supporting 15,000,000 people.

Porto Rico, starting at the Cuban War with only 50,000 or 75,000 tons and its production now stimulated to 500,000 tons—where will Porto Rico stand when Cuba, producing its sugar upon the most fertile soil, in the best climate, and at the lowest wage cost, starts out to absorb the production which Porto Rico has thus far yielded and starts out in the race against Porto Rico rid of the present handicap of 1⅛ cents a pound—$30 a ton—notwithstanding which it has been able since the Spanish War to increase its production from 500,000 tons to 2,300,000 tons?

Then, we have the Philippine Islands, those unfortunate waifs in the ocean that we took under our protection and care. As a matter of mistaken generosity what did we do? Instead of assuring to those islands an isolated existence, with their entire economic and governmental system separated from our own, so that at the right time we could simply cut the tie that bound those islands to ourselves and start them on their career of individualized life, we thought we were doing them a favor by taking them within our protective-tariff system, and we gave them, as the result of successive legislation, the right to import into this country 300,000 tons of sugar duty free; and the bill which we have before us proposes to allow them to import without any limitation whatsoever. What was the effect? The effect was to relieve the sugar producer from the duty of 1⅛ cents a pound which he was compelled to pay to the United States prior to that time. Taken inside of our tariff walls by this reciprocal arrangement, they were relieved of that duty and immediately the production of sugar started, and they now have a production of 200,000 tons in the Philippine Islands as against 50,000 or 60,000 tons prevailing before this action.

The Democratic Party proposes to dispose of the Philippine Islands, ultimately to cut off these islands, and then to start them in an individualized life. Have we been generous to them to accustom them to a hothouse system of a protective tariff during these years, when the very process of cutting them off involves the destruction of the hothouse methods?

The Philippine Islands will then drift into their individual life, compelled to compete not under favored laws with this country but with the entire world—a competition which they were not able to bear before their annexation to this country.

So we will have precipitated upon us the economic distress of the Hawaiian Islands, of Porto Rico, and of the Philippine Islands just as soon as we declare that no duties whatever shall be imposed upon foreign imports of sugar, that the duty now paid upon sugar by Cuban producers shall be taken away, and that Cuban sugar shall have the absolute control of our markets; and we can then have the comforting assurance that the American Sugar Trust, against which so much of our legislation and litigation has been directed, is again triumphant, for it and its stockholders, now owning the most prosperous sugar plantations of Cuba and bound to acquire more, will not only refine but will also produce almost all the sugar consumed in the United States.

Mr. President, I can recall the time when the Cuban reciprocity treaty was up before Congress. I was then a member of the Ways and Means Committee of the House; and against the views entertained by my party generally, I opposed Cuban reciprocity. I insisted that what we needed with Cuba was not a commercial union but a political union. I insisted that if we waited long enough not only political but economic necessity would drive Cuba to seek admission to our Union. I desired the accession of an island not overpopulated like Porto Rico, not overpopulated like the Philippine Islands, but an island with a population of only a million and a half and a capacity of 15,000,000—an island which the white race would have dominated and regenerated and made one of the choicest parts of our territory. But we were disposed to be generous, and we were also a little bit calculating as a result of the pressure of the manufacturers, who were willing to let in Cuban sugar at a reduced duty if Cuba would let in American manufactures at a reduced duty.

So the reciprocity arrangement went through with the consent of both parties. I am glad to say that I had no share in that folly. I believe if we had stood out and had said to Cuba, "We have given you your liberty; we have given you individuality; you are now a sovereign State, and you must get along as you can in your rivalries and your commercial contentions with the world," that was all that Cuba had the right to demand, and that to yield to her request for a favored duty was a weakness approaching folly. I believe if we had waited Cuba would have been driven by economic necessity to ask annexation to this country, and ultimately we could have made out of Cuba what we can never make out of any other of our island possessions—a sovereign State of the Union.

Now, what is the situation? It is proposed now to give away to Cuba all this duty. You propose to make her sugar duty free and at the same time permit her to maintain her tariff wall against American products. You had a reciprocal arrangement by which her sugar came in with the reduced duty and our products went into Cuba under a reduced duty. You now take away all of the duty imposed upon her products and let her tariff wall stand as against all of our products. We have no reason, then, to ask for any reciprocal arrangement. She can immediately denounce that reciprocal treaty and impose upon all the products of the United States going into Cuba the same duties that she imposes upon other countries; and we will give away that great commercial advantage to a country which is indebted to us beyond expression for the sacrifice of blood and treasure in the securing and the maintenance of her liberty.

Mr. President, is it not time to think instead of to declaim? Is it not about time, first, that we should clear the atmosphere and ascertain what the Democratic Party proposes to do? From the speeches one hears upon this subject you might conclude that there were only two alternatives—one, the maintenance of the present high protective and oppressive duties upon sugar; the other, free sugar.

No one contemplates the maintenance of the present high protective tariff upon sugar. No one contemplates any protection whatever to the refiners of sugar. No one contemplates any advantage whatever to the sugar refiners, to the Sugar Trusts, which thus far have been the objects of execration.

What is contemplated? Why, an immediate reduction, with the approval of the President, of this duty from 1.34 cents on the pound to 1 cent a pound for three years, a duty of about 50 per cent. Then the other question to be determined is, after that three years, whether that duty shall sink to the level of the general percentage of duties imposed by the Underwood bill upon all dutiable articles, viz, 25 per cent—one-half cent per pound—or whether it shall drift to the free list; that is all.

Mr. President, the country which I represent is an arid region, called "The Great American Desert"—a country which some years ago was regarded as almost uninhabitable, but which, through the genius and energy of man, has been made the most favored part of this country for his residence. Private enterprise has constructed there great irrigation works, by means of which the snow waters falling upon the mountains have been spread over the arid plains and have increased the production of a fertile soil under the influence of a kindly sun. The Government itself has supplemented the work of private capital by devoting the proceeds of the sale of public lands to great reclamation works in 17 States, 23 projects rivaling in engineering difficulties the great work of the Panama Canal, and upon which $75,000,000 have been expended, the moneys to be returned by the settlers upon the arid lands in 10 annual installments as payment for their water rights. Thus a great revolving fund has been created, which involves the spending of the moneys on the lands, their return through the sale of water rights, and their expenditure again upon new lands, so that ultimately this fund will reclaim all of that desert that is capable of reclamation.

The Government realized the importance of fitting that great desert for the habitation of man. Private enterprise recognized it as a great outlet for a teeming population that is spreading out more rapidly every day toward the West. The population is as yet limited. Their productions are mainly the productions of the mine, the forest, and the farm. The productions of the forest and the farm are not able to pay for long and distant carriage the freights that are usually exacted and the local population is unable and insufficient to absorb the supply. The products of the soil are bulky—alfalfa, hay, and other products of that kind. They found at last one product, the sugar beet, the whole value of which can be compressed into one-sixth of its weight. The whole value of a ton of sugar beets can be compressed into raw sugar of a weight of 300 pounds, and thus it will bear transportation; and that 300 pounds is a product in universal demand all over the world, which commands a cash price everywhere.

Encouraged by the Government, encouraged by your Agricultural Department, the people of that region have during the last 8 or 10 years started upon the production of sugar beets, involving concurrently large capitalization in factories to slice the beets, extract the sugar, and put it upon the market.

During this time there have been varying conditions as to possible legislation that tended to retard the growth of this costly industry, and yet it has advanced. It has the advantage not only of producing a product which can be compressed into one-sixth of the weight of the beets themselves, but of inducing an intensive cultivation, a rotation of crops, that vastly stimulates the production of the soil. It is to the cultivation of the beet that Germany and France and Austria owe more of their agricultural development than any other thing, and we all know that their production per acre far surpasses our own because of the perfection of their scientific methods.

So we of the West have been hoping that this industry would advance without being crippled in its infancy, though we have not been contentious for high rates of duty. Some of our people have contended for those, but I never have. But we have been insisting that if there was any incidental protection in a tariff for revenue, that incidental protection should reach to the farmer of the arid region as well as to the farmer of the South and of the Middle West.

We find almost all these agricultural products of the Middle West put by this bill upon the dutiable list, and the farm products of the arid West put upon the free list. We inquire the reason, and we ascertain that the Democratic Party was afraid of the farmers' vote.

The Republican Party has fastened its oppressive and outrageous system of protection upon the country how? By creating a community of interest between the manufacturers on the one hand and the cattle growers and the sheep growers and the farmers upon the other. They have deluded the exporting farmers of the country by making them believe that a duty imposed upon the nonexistent imports of farm products really protected them; and the Democratic Party in this bill is guilty of continuing that deception, and continuing it to the farmers of the Middle West and the South, while they deny a tariff which does involve an incidental protection to a struggling and an infant industry in the far West.

My contention is not made upon any protective principle. I have seen enough of a protective tariff. I have been in Congress for 20 years, and have witnessed three or four revisions of the tariff. I have seen the interested parties come here time after time and press their claims. I have seen organizations made, unions made, communities of interest established, by which oppressive rates have been maintained. God knows I do not wish the perpetuation or the maintenance of any such system. But I do insist that a Democrat can still stand for a tariff for revenue; that the Democratic Party has never yet declared itself to be a free-trade party; that its traditions all lie not in the line of a large free list, but of a large but moderate dutiable list. You will find that the enlargement of the free list has been the action of the Republican Party, determined to diminish the area of duties in order that it might increase the magnitude of the duties.

So this free-list policy is not in accord with the history or the traditions of the Democratic Party. It is in absolute accord with the policy and the traditions of the Republican Party, which, in order to maintain high duties upon a few favored articles, put other articles upon the free list lest duties imposed upon them might reduce the general level of duties.

Mr. President, my view of an ideal revision of the tariff is one that will involve a gradual cutting off of the high duties and a gradual reduction of existing duties to a level of about 25 per cent and a gradual imposition of duties commencing at 1 per cent and ending at 5 or 10 per cent upon the articles that are now on the free list. If we would pursue such a policy as that we would have ample revenue, we would have moderate duties, and we would have exceedingly low duties upon the necessaries of life.

Mr. President, we are met by the statement that this question has been practically decided, that the President and the House have practically agreed upon the tariff bill, and that it is incumbent upon all good Democrats to support the bill either as an administration or as a party measure. I am sure that that view can not be entertained either by the House of Representatives or by the President. I have seen nothing whatever in the words or in the actions of the President, with whom I have come in communication upon this subject, that would warrant me in believing that he regards the duty of tariff making as already accomplished. President Wilson throughout the interviews in which I have participated has been considerate and dignified, and has never assumed such a position as the newspapers would have us believe he is assuming.

Nor do I believe the House entertains such a view. It is preposterous that anyone should entertain such a view. There are three factors in tariff making, and when I speak of tariff making I mean making a Democratic tariff. The Democrats of the House, the Democrats of the Senate, and a Democratic President. The President has the power of initiative by recommendation, and he has also the power of veto. So far as I am concerned I have always welcomed him cordially into our councils. I have not been one of those who believed that the President should wait until Congress has acted and should then simply exercise his power either of approval or veto. I believe that through his power of recommendation and of veto he is a part of the legislative organization, and that we, as Democrats, both in the House and the Senate, ought to take him into our councils regarding a Democratic measure.

But surely the President will also cheerfully concede that he is not the only factor, that the Democrats of the House with him do not constitute the only factors, but that the Democrats of the Senate are called upon by the obligation of their office to discharge their full duty.

The President of the United States is the choice of a popular election, and therefore perhaps represents the whole people more than anyone else. The House as the popular body represents the people of the United States in their respective districts. They represent districts, not the entire people. The Senators are ambassadors of the States, and for the first time, then, the action of States as political units upon matters of legislation is taken. They are the special guardians against either sectional or regional injustice.

Beyond the Missouri there lie 17 States, one-third of all the States in the Union, each one a sovereign State with two Senators in this body. They are entitled to represent those States. They are entitled to present their protests against sectional or regional injustice. They are entitled to demand that the Democratic Party shall not maintain and preserve a protective system in the East and in the Middle West and at the same time in the far West apply a free-trade system, compelling them to produce in a free-trade market and to buy in a protected market. The West has something to say regarding this tariff, and its voice will be heard despite the clamor of the hour.

Mr. President, I will not go into details as to the discriminatory action of this tariff regarding western products. All I can say is that almost everything that is produced there has either been put upon the free list or has been drifted toward the free list, whilst upon eastern and middle western products an average duty of 25 per cent still stands. I do not complain of the latter; I think the Democratic Party has gone far enough in reducing the average of the duties upon the dutiable list from 40 per cent to 25 per cent; but I contend that it goes too far when it reduces duties from an average of 40 per cent to zero, and that, too, upon products belonging to a particular section.

But it is said that sugar and wool are hothouse industries; that hothouse methods have been adopted for years; that the wool industry has not grown; that hothouse methods have been pursued for years and the sugar industry has not grown as rapidly as might be expected; and there is much declamation against hothouse methods.

Well, Mr. President, as between that and a reduction upon a product that is indigenous to the soil, that belongs to our country, with reference to which no protection either intended or incidental is needed, I should say it is much less unjust to take the duty entirely off of the latter product than it is to take the entire duty off a stimulated product, a hothouse product, for if sugar production is a hothouse production it is the result of the settled policy of both the Democratic and the Republican Parties for a hundred years, a policy for which neither party is exclusively responsible, and only varied from once in that whole period, and that not by the Democratic Party, but by the Republican Party, which, in the McKinley tariff, substituted a bounty by way of protection for a duty.

Mr. President, it is the hothouse industry which has been pursued pursuant to law, encouraged by law, encouraged by the settled policy of the country, that should be gently treated when you are reducing the tariff, and it was with reference to just such industries that the Democratic platform declared that the tariff had been inseparably associated with the business of the country, and that therefore reduction should be made in such a way as not to destroy or injure any legitimate industry.

So if sugar and wool are hothouse industries, as it is claimed, it is all the more incumbent upon the Democratic Party under its platform to treat them gently—not to take away all the heat, so that the destruction of life may come, but to gradually reduce the heat, so that they may become accustomed to a normal temperature and may live in it.

The Democratic Party made no war upon hothouse industries. On the contrary, it expressly declared in terms of tenderness that the reductions upon such industries should be made in such a way as not to imperil or destroy them.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to say one word regarding the political aspects of this question. The Democratic Party, after years of effort, has come into power as the minority party—a plurality party. Had the forces of the stand-pat Republicans and the Progressive Party been united in the last campaign the Democratic Party would have been defeated. In that campaign there were four parties—the Socialist Party, the Progressive Party, the Republican Party, and the Democratic Party—and of all those parties the Democratic Party alone declared for a tariff for revenue. Vicious as I regard the protective system and harmful as I regard that system to the country, there can be no question from the party votes and the party platforms that the tariff-for-revenue policy is not the most popular policy in this country. All the country declared for was a material reduction in the tariff. The West stood for that policy, and it stood against the exactions and the oppressions of the Republican Party. As the result of that propaganda, declared by the Democratic Party, the region west of the Missouri, which a few years ago only had one Democratic Senator, swept into the Democratic ranks 14 Democratic Senators.

The Democratic Party has much to accomplish. It will take many years to accomplish what it has before it. Eight years of control at least are essential to put upon the statute books and in administration the reforms that it contemplates. The loss of four Senators from the region west of the Missouri would turn the Senate over to the control of our opponents, and Democratic opportunity would be gone for years. We have to-day an overwhelming majority in the House of Representatives, but if you scan the returns you will see how narrow the margin was in many cases—pluralities, and small pluralities at that. Let this country drift during the next year into a period of depression and the great masses of the people will take their revenge upon the party in power. The voters are not all economists. They simply feel results. They do not reason out what causes the results, and they vote according to the results.

It is for this reason that I have been so anxious, radical as I am in my views regarding the tariff, that the Democratic Party should proceed slowly upon the line of reform, without violent readjustments that would disturb the times and put men out of employment and turn against the party vast masses of voters at the coming election.

The mission of the Democratic Party is a glorious mission. It would be the height of folly to impede and to obstruct that issue by precipitate and disastrous action upon matters of mere detail. With so many great questions of principle before the country, shall we exalt the question as to whether two products shall be upon the free list or shall have the average duty imposed upon them, to the position of a great issue presented to the American people—one involving morality and justice and political loyalty?

Mr. President, I feel sure that the Democratic Party will think; I feel sure that the three factors which shape legislation that is of so much importance to this party in the near future will see to it that by mutual consideration and by mutual concession a line of policy may be adopted not prejudicial to the traditions of the party, but in line with those traditions, that will bring in loyal adherence to the party every Democrat who voted with it at the last election; that there will be no heartburnings, no feelings of sectional or regional injustice, no complaint of discrimination; that, having a radical end in view, we shall advance to that end by gradual, not revolutionary, methods, always having the goal in view, and determined to permit nothing to swerve us from finally reaching it.

I can imagine no greater misfortune to the party, I can imagine no greater misfortune that could occur to the country, than the temporary loss of power by the Democratic Party, either in the other House or in the Senate. As a representative of one of the sovereign States of the Union, I beseech my fellow Democrats to give that region no reason to feel that it is the victim either of discrimination or of injustice. Many loyal Democrats out there may wish on the whole more radical action to be taken than that which we at present contemplate; but though they desire more radical action, they will resent discriminatory action; and this danger is one that is to be considered and met.

Mr. President, I have spoken at considerable length upon this question, but I have not attempted to go into details regarding western products. All I ask is that the Finance Committee shall, regardless of the fact that the other House and the President have come to some conclusions regarding this bill, examine it on their oaths as representatives of sovereign States and see to it, in the only body in which sectional injustice can be guarded against, that loyal Democrats all over the country have no reason to complain of the justice of their party.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I had intended to vote against the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to refer this bill to the Finance Committee with instructions to hold public hearings. I had not considered it necessary to hold hearings. I had thought that the theory upon which the bill was framed did not require any action of that kind, and that we had abundant testimony taken a short time ago to give all the information necessary to act on a bill framed upon the theory of this bill. I was prepared to state my reasons for the vote I had intended to cast; but the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] has practically stated that the committee has decided to hold hearings of a certain character; that it has decided to call upon those representing the industries of the country for certain information.

I believe, as the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] has stated, that whatever hearings are held should be public hearings, and that when the committee seeks information from individuals it should have those individuals before it, so that it may cross-examine them. By reason of that fact, and the fact that the committee does consider it necessary to ask for and seek additional information, I propose to vote for the motion.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I wish to correct the Senator. I presume he was referring to what the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] said and not to what I said.

Mr. JONES. No; I referred to the statement made by the Senator that the committee had decided to send the interrogatories submitted by the Senator from Wisconsin to those representing different industries and to call upon them for information.

Mr. SIMMONS. And ask them to answer those questions under oath.

Mr. JONES. Yes. My point is that if the committee thinks it is necessary to secure that information it should call those individuals before it so that they can be cross-examined and all the testimony they may give can be brought to the attention of the committee.

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to say to the Senator that, as I understand, all of the witnesses who were examined before the House Committee on Ways and Means were examined under oath; but the Senator from Wisconsin suggested certain questions which might throw light upon the subject, and I thought, to meet his suggestion, that it would be just as well to send those questions to them and let them answer them as they might see proper.

Mr. JONES. I understand all that; but because of the fact that the House had held hearings, such as they were, before a part of the membership of the committee and because of the previous hearings, I had decided to vote against this motion. However, when the Senator stated, in effect, that the committee felt they ought to have some additional information and that they were going to send these interrogatories out, it seemed to me that it would be almost a farce to have these people send in written answers to these interrogatories, giving just what information they felt free to give and going no further than seemed to them necessary to sustain their contentions. It appeared to me that it would be better for the Senate and the Finance Committee that they should hold hearings, where these people could be cross-examined.

Mr. WALSH obtained the floor.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I ask the Senator to yield to me, not to enable me to make a speech or to read anything, but to send up a page or two of remarks made by Senator Aldrich in 1909, touching the very subject matter we are discussing, which I should like to have inserted in the RECORD at this point without reading it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, would the Senator object if I had the remarks of Senator Daniel, of Virginia, inserted following that?

Mr. STONE. I would not.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, Mr. President, I ask that the remarks of Senator Daniel be inserted to follow those of Senator Aldrich.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the matter will be printed in the RECORD, as requested.

The matter submitted by Mr. STONE is as follows:

[In the Senate, Apr. 1, 1909. Page 721, RECORD.]

Mr. ALDRICH. The Republican majority of Congress will be properly held responsible to the people of the country for the character of the tariff legislation which is to be enacted at this session, and they also will be responsible, in my judgment, to an equal if not a greater extent for any failure to act promptly upon this important subject. * * * In a government of parties the responsibility of the party in power for legislation can not be evaded or avoided, and there is no disposition, so far as I know, on the part of any representative of the Republican Party in this Chamber to avoid or evade this responsibility. * * * I have recollection and personal knowledge with reference to the preparation and discussion and disposition of eight different tariff bills—four Democratic and four Republican. * * * In the preparation of each of these bills on the part of the committee of the House of Representatives the work was done by the majority members of the Committee on Ways and Means, without the assent or approval or without a conference with the Republican members of the committee in the case of Democratic measures and without conference with the Democratic members in the case of Republican bills. When the House bills reached this body a similar course was pursued here. The amendments to be recommended by the Finance Committee in each case were agreed to or prepared by majority members of that committee, without conference with the minority members. They were usually prepared by a subcommittee of the majority, who reported to their associates, then to the full committee, and afterwards to the Senate. It will be evident upon the merest examination that this course is absolutely necessary in a country which has a government by parties. A similar course is followed in every country of the world that has a representative government by parties. * * *

(Referring to the Wilson-Gorman bill, Mr. Aldrich said:)

It came to this body and was sent to the Committee on Finance, of which I was then a member. That committee was presided over by the distinguished Senator from Indiana, Mr. Voorhees. * * * At that time at no point in the consideration of the bill was any Republican ever asked his opinion as to what should be done, and there was no meeting of the majority of the committee at which it was suggested that any Republican should be present, and no Republican was ever called into conference.

I will confess that for myself I should have as soon thought of going to Mr. Voorhees and insisting that I should be invited to his house to dinner as that I should have insisted that I had a right to go before the members of the committee and hear the statements of the men whom I knew were before the members of that committee every day.

* * * * * * *

Mr. DANIEL. Are there private conversations recited in the testimony delivered before the members of the committee, or is it public testimony, to be spread before the country?

* * * * * * *

Mr. ALDRICH. I am trying to call the attention of the Senate to the practices of the past.

Mr. DANIEL. I understand. For gentlemen to go off and confer is a privilege which is permissible in every country in the world.

Mr. ALDRICH. These gentlemen were having private conversations, if you please, for the purpose of eliciting information as to the character of the bill they were preparing to present to this body, as they had a perfect right to do. It is a recognized right in tariff legislation, and has been for half a century, and it will be, in my judgment, until the end of time.

* * * * * * *

Mr. ALDRICH. The minority of the committee are holding meetings of their own. We do not ask who goes before them. We do not ask to go before them and cross-examine their witnesses. I am seeing personally 100 men a day, so far as I have time, my time being taken up with this matter 18 hours out of the 24. Does the Senator from Georgia think I ought to look him up every time a man comes to me for a conversation, in order that he may cross-examine the man to find out whether he thinks the information is valuable?

* * * * * * *

Mr. BACON. * * * My contention is that the majority members of the Committee on Finance practically determine whether or not there shall be a hearing. They have determined that there shall be no hearing.

Mr. ALDRICH. No public hearing.

Mr. BACON. They have had a hearing by the committee and have excluded the Democratic members from participation in it.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Georgia is neither brief nor informed in that statement. No such condition has arisen and no such condition is likely to arise. The committee announced publicly and privately that they would not give any public hearings. There have been none. There have been no hearings of any kind technically by any members of that committee. I have had conversations, and various other members of the committee have had conversations, for the purpose of eliciting information that would help us in the great work which has been devolved upon the members of that committee. If we should undertake to follow the suggestions of the Senator from Georgia, we could not pass a tariff bill for the next three years.

* * * The suggestion that all the precedents in reference to this matter should be disregarded and that the members of the minority should be present for purposes of cross-examination at every conversation held by the majority of the committee with the people who are supposed to have, or do have, information is absurd.

* * * * * * *

Mr. DANIEL. What is the objection to Democrats being present and hearing a recital of those important facts?

Mr. ALDRICH. Because the responsibility is upon us and we desire to pass a tariff bill in this year of our Lord.

The matter submitted by Mr. SMOOT is as follows:

DEMOCRATS EXCLUDED FROM COMMITTEE MEETINGS.

Mr. DANIEL. * * * This, Mr. President, is a prodigious bill. It contains 302 pages and carries about a million dollars a page.

The Democratic Members of this body never saw it or heard it read, for it was not read at the one meeting of the Finance Committee which they attended. It was not brought here until April 12, when it was reported by the chairman of the Finance Committee with over 300 amendments. None of these amendments were we permitted to see before they were presented here, and not one of them did we have the opportunity to vote upon before they were brought here with the committee's approbation. Many witnesses appeared, as stated, before the Senate Finance Committee. We heard not one of them. Not one of them were we permitted to cross-examine. There were some of them, if the press be correct, whom I should like very much to have had the opportunity to cross-examine. I should like to have asked some of them, especially those interested in iron and steel, why one of the committee, after their departure, put a duty on sulphate of ammonia, which is the food for the plants of this country, and is a specific burden upon all our farmers. But it was a closed shop.

I can not regard the method pursued as either good or fair government. Each one of us has at home constituents who are as much interested as any other constituent body of any Senator. Besides, we are all Americans. We are all as anxious for justice to be done to all of our country as any of those who assume the prerogative of excluding us from the opportunities of which they avail themselves most elaborately. It is a disadvantage to the whole public, for, having the desire to do the right thing and, so far as we may, the wise thing, we not only wish but need all the light that can be found upon these important matters to guide us through these labyrinthian schedules. The indignity of such a course is toward the people of the United States. It is also toward the Senate of the United States. We have the honor to be Members of the only body in this country where there remains free debate and where the Members in their rules and in their conduct have in nothing more distinguished themselves in the minds of the American people than by creating the reputation that here everybody would be heard. We must be heard in committee as well as upon the floor, and the invitation of our colleagues for light in all things except in their exclusive conduct, that we could go into the Senate and thrash these things out, is an invitation which we are forced to accept from having been denied a share in their councils.

The organization of the House of Representatives as an American institution does not permit any kind of free range to the Members, as of old was the custom of the fathers of this country and of their descendants for many generations. It is not permitted in that body for a Member to offer an amendment to a bill levying upon his constituents with others $300,000,000, and to ask and get a vote upon it. I shall not forget the proper rule of the Senate that one House must not indulge in disrespectful allusions to another. But the facts of the organization of each House are upon an open page of American history, and I may advert to the existence of those facts and admonish and advise my people as to what their Representatives have to encounter under this free Constitution of the United States.

I introduce a witness from that House. He is the chairman, or was the chairman at one time, of the Democratic organization there—the Hon. CHAMP CLARK, of Missouri. This is what he has to say as to conditions in that body:

"The Democratic Members did as much work during the 'hearings' as did the Republican Members, and were as patriotic and conscientious as they. In such a joint labor nobody would have placed in the bill all he wanted. Nor is it at all probable that even a single Republican member of the committee or of the House is entirely satisfied with the Payne bill as reported, to say nothing of the Democratic Members. In such a joint labor there could have been no danger of our outvoting them. If the whole committee could have united on a bill, either in whole or in part, under the peculiar circumstances in which we find ourselves, it would have greatly expedited the passage of the bill, thereby relieving the country of the long and wearisome weeks, perhaps months, of business uncertainty and suspense. If there is delay in the passage of the bill and business stagnates by reason thereof and financial loss results from it, let the blame be placed where it properly belongs, upon the head of the Republican Party.

"Having spent nearly three months in framing their bill, they graciously called in the Democratic Members, and in precisely 12 minutes reported it back to the House without one moment's discussion, without changing a word, without even reading the title—an astounding demonstration of the fact that we live in a fast age and are traveling at a rapid gait.

"This happened on March 18, and no member of the minority had ever seen the bill or any paragraph thereof till noon on Wednesday, the 17th of March, and had not the remotest idea of its provisions except by the merest guesswork. In fact, it was currently reported in the public press that so fearful were the Republican Members that the Democratic Members or some other American citizen might secure some knowledge of the contents of the Payne bill that its authors not only kept it under lock and key, but employed armed guards to keep watch and ward over their precious bantling—an absolutely superfluous performance, as many parts of it are utterly incomprehensible even after careful study. And yet this bill, which was too sacred for any eyes except the 12 majority Members and a few of their trusted friends, contains 234 large pages and deals with tariff taxes on about 4,000 articles of everyday consumption, influencing the interests, prosperity, and happiness of 90,000,000 American citizens and involving our trade relations with the whole world. We have had only five days in which to consider and report upon a bill which they spent nearly three months in preparing."

No gentleman ever cares for the association of other gentlemen when his presence is not welcome. There is not a man in this House, I am sure, who would ever obtrude himself upon any assemblage. We are neither so vain nor so unreasonable as to conceive that the exclusion in this body or in the other had any application to the personality excluded. For what reason that can be proclaimed did the Senate committee exclude its Democratic confrères from holding meetings with that body? It was not from any disrespect of them. It was not that they do not practice the amenities, the civilities, and the proprieties of life in all companionship. What could it have been done for—that they wished to derive some information that they did not wish to impart to others? But I will not probe the matter further. It was certainly not for the convenience of this body. It may have served for the nonce the convenience of some of those members; but I can not think that those gentlemen would appropriate and monopolize to themselves for their own sake conveniences and benefits that they would not readily share with their colleagues, whether Democratic, Republican, or what not.

Therefore it is impossible to conceive of any motive save of some advantage to be gained, either in debate upon this subject or in its result, and, as I am no further concerned with it, I leave it as it stands, but commend the matter to the consideration of a body which was planned by the Constitution of this country to extend equality to every Member, which made that equality basic in the organic law. That equality sends here from New England 12 Senators to exercise properly those conferred faculties. They would not possess them in proportion to inhabitants, but do rightly possess and energetically employ them. These facts should remind them, while in the enjoyment of their privileges, that a Senator in this body from the smallest State, whether in territory, whether in wealth, or whether in political influence or not, whether in the fashion of the times or not, has exactly the same right that any other and every other Senator has. When any one of those Senators takes away from me or my people or from any other Senator in this body the right of equal communication, of equal opportunity, and of equality in all respects which belongs to the positions which we occupy, it is a thing that should receive proper notice.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. DANIEL. With pleasure.

Mr. CULBERSON. I do not think the proposition of the Senator from Virginia needs any support in authority, strong as it is in itself, and yet if he will permit me I will read a short paragraph from Jefferson's Manual, which is published by the Senate as a part of its rules:

"A committee meet when and where they please, if the House has not ordered time and place for them, but they can only act when together, and not by separate consultation and consent—nothing being the report of the committee but what has been agreed to in committee actually assembled."

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Texas for reading so apposite an illustration and declaration of the law of the matter to which I have referred. But, Mr. President, the average American has studied, and if not studied has observed by instinct, the fundamental principles of fair play and square deal. We need not go to any law book to find the vindication of my assertion. It is instinctive to the American man, and I leave it to his contemplation. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, proceedings of Apr. 19, 1909.)

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I desire to address myself for a few moments to the question before the Senate, the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

The agitation to which the present measure has given rise, as has been the case in nearly every general revision of the tariff in a generation, has centered about the two commodities of wool and sugar—coincidentally enough, two of the leading industries of the great State which I have the honor in part to represent. Down to the present time the people of my State have done me the honor, apparently, to believe that as the occasion should arise I would exercise a reasonably sound judgment in the disposition of questions that come before the Senate for consideration, and have not aided me nor troubled me with advice upon them. I am now, however, in connection with the matter before the Senate, the recipient of a large number of telegrams asking me to vote in favor of public hearings before the Finance Committee. Most of these come from people interested in the production of sugar, and in my lack of acquaintance with the procedure in those matters I am led to believe that they come to me as the result of a campaign inaugurated by some one to that end. I am entirely confident that most of these come from people genuinely concerned, and perhaps more or less apprehensive, about the action of this body with reference to the pending measure, who are entirely ignorant of what has transpired in reference to the collation of information upon that subject.

So I take the time of the Senate to say that I have now on my desk before me the report of the Hardwick Committee, appointed by the House of Representatives in the summer of the year 1911, and charged with the duty of investigating the American Sugar Refining Co., popularly known as the Sugar Trust. It contains all the testimony taken upon that hearing, the committee having sat from the month of June, 1911, to the month of January, 1912.

The investigation covered the whole subject of the production of sugar. Witnesses were called from all parts of the country, and the committee pursued not only the line of inquiry into the organization of the American Sugar Refining Co. and other companies engaged in the production of sugar, but into every phase and feature of the production of sugar, including its cost, and the general facts in relation to it. The testimony embraces about 4.000 pages of printed matter.

I have likewise on my desk before me the hearings conducted by the Senate Finance Committee upon the same subject in the month of April, 1912, the hearings stretching over a period of nearly three weeks, when the whole subject was again canvassed by the Senate Finance Committee.

It has been said that the investigation first referred to was conducted by a hostile committee. Be that as it may, the facts have been developed, and they are here for the use of anybody who desires to make use of them.

I likewise have upon my desk a third volume, being the report of hearings conducted by the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives in the month of January last upon this schedule. In this is testimony in relation to the industry in my own State. The Senate committee heard Mr. Hans Mendelson, an eminent scientist connected with the Billings factory, and as well informed upon the subject of sugar throughout the world as perhaps any man in the United States. He is the expert for the company operating the factory in my State. Before the House committee Mr. W. S. Garnsey, jr., the manager of that factory, was heard, and submitted a brief; and at the same time the other side of the question was heard through Mr. I. D. O'Donnell, a farmer of great skill and intelligence, and as well informed about conditions as any farmer in the State of Montana. He is a scientific farmer, a leader in the development of farming in my State, a teacher of scientific methods all over the State through the instrumentality of farmers' institutes and the like. He speaks with entire knowledge of the subject, for he is engaged in the business of raising sugar beets himself.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I know the Senator's time is very limited, and I shall not break in upon it but for just a moment, if I may do so.

Mr. WALSH. I shall be glad to hear the Senator.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I should like to inquire if the Senator has read the hearings upon sugar?

Mr. WALSH. I have.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Can the Senator inform me whether they disclose the amount of profit which the beet-sugar people derive from the tariff?

Mr. WALSH. They disclose——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That specific fact is the one I am after.

Mr. WALSH. The answer is a mere matter of inference. They disclose the cost, and they disclose the amounts received.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. But if the Senator has been able to figure out just exactly what the profit is, I should be glad to have him give it; and one thing more: What percentage of the total cost of a unit of production, say 100 pounds of sugar, goes to labor?

Those are just one or two questions. I should like to cover the whole subject, but time does not permit.

Mr. WALSH. The fact is given; the report of the testimony shows the amount paid for labor.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It gives the amount paid in wages; but when you come to fix a duty by the pound or hundred pounds, that is just the trouble with all these hearings, if the Senator will pardon me; you can not figure out from the amount of stuff that there is there the thing that you need to fix the duty.

Mr. WALSH. I must answer the question by saying that I am unable to understand how you can demonstrate the fact by calling any witness again when he has given you the cost, and has given you the selling price, and has given all the elements that enter into each item. It seems to me the matter the Senator asks for is a mere matter of deduction that can not be drawn from any witnesses.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, if the Senator intends to give me time to answer, that is just exactly what you can not get from any of these tariff hearings—the specific data which it is necessary to know, as applied to a unit of production upon which the tariff is levied, in order to determine how much of it goes to labor, how much of it goes to capital, and how much of it represents profit.

Mr. WALSH. However, Mr. President, I desire to continue by simply saying that after a careful study of this matter I am unable to conceive of a single fact in relation to this particular industry that could be elucidated that has not already been presented upon either the one side or the other.

Likewise, with reference to the subject of wool, the Tariff Board only a very short while ago went into an exhaustive investigation of the subject, and gave us the results of its inquiry. That is at the command of everyone.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's time is up.

Mr. WALSH. I may add if, in my judgment, any further information could be elicited from anybody concerned in either of these industries in my State that would tend to shed any light upon the subject, I should be glad to have the inquiry go on. As it is, it occurs to me to be entirely useless.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, the limited time remaining will probably more than suffice for what I shall have to say, because I doubt if anything that can be said in this presence will change the prearranged program in regard to this tariff bill.

I had hoped that there might be hearings before the committee. I had hoped that the great mass of business in this Republic, all of which is to be affected by the legislation which we are called upon to enact, would be given at least the poor privilege of a hearing before the Houses of Congress and letting its wants and views be known. But I have little hope that even if that should be granted, it would make any difference in the result.

I believe the edict has gone forth. I believe the Underwood bill is as much a l w now for all practical purposes as it will be after the vote of the Senate is registered. I believe the real vote upon the Underwood bill will be taken in this body, where it was taken in the other, behind closed doors, in a secret party caucus.

I know men on that side of the Chamber who would gladly break away from political domination. I know men on that side of the aisle who believe that this bill is not just and righteous altogether, who believe that industries in their State are threatened—aye, and who believe that interests in their State are doomed; but, as said by the eminent Senator from Mississippi yesterday, they are going to bow their heads to the demands of the caucus. They are going to obey the lash of party expediency. There is no question about it.

I wish there might have been hearings. Whatever has been said about hearings, open hearings or closed hearings, before committees in times past, I venture to say that never in the history of tariff legislation, since tariff legislation began, was such a successful attempt made to railroad through a secret political caucus a great measure affecting every item of our daily life, in a great country that is the peer of any country on the face of the earth.

Mr. President, I hoped that the things might be otherwise. I had intended to say that I believed these great interests were entitled to come before the committee of the Senate, although not necessarily for the sole purpose of giving information to the committee alone. Undoubtedly the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] and the other Senators on the majority of this committee are perfectly competent to frame a tariff bill without information. Undoubtedly they have so studied the intricate questions affecting our tariff and our economic life that they are competent to sit down behind closed doors and, without other information to work out a tariff that shall be the economic salvation of this country.

But I believe, further, that there is a right on the part of these great interests themselves. I believe that when a man's interests and his business are threatened or are to be passed upon by Congress, whether it be by the tariff or by other law, he has a right to come to the doors of committee rooms of Congress to be heard.

There are Members on that side who have preached the open door. There are Members who have preached that the committees of this House must always stand with open doors. There are Members upon that side who in their past life have detested down deep in their hearts and have exploited on the floor of the Senate their abhorrence of the secret party caucus. Yet there are very few but that within a few weeks of this time will come upon this floor and vote not their convictions, but what they have been told to vote, and what they will agree beforehand by the secret party caucus to vote.

Is it right? Do you believe it is right? Do you believe it is the right way to legislate? I know you do not. Yet the great Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], having honest views upon the economic questions that confront us, having his own knowledge and views of right and wrong, said yesterday upon the floor of the Senate that he should take his views upon the tariff from his party associates.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I wish to yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming subsequently said: Mr. President, I rose just before 4 o'clock for the purpose of putting into the RECORD a short extract, consisting of 10 or 12 lines, which give my views upon the subject matter under discussion. I ask unanimous consent that I may now put in that extract in connection with the remarks I then made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and permission is granted.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. In connection with this motion for open hearings, I may be permitted to call the attention of my Democratic friends to a work recently published, The New Freedom, in which the leader of your party, the President of the United States, whose influence is most potent in this Chamber and at whose slightest wish tariff schedules are written and altered, and whose judgment as to rates is implicitly followed by the Democratic Party in this body, makes use of the following words, which I commend to your careful consideration before this vote is taken. The words are found at page 143, and are as follows:

> The moral of the whole matter is this: The business of the United States is not, as a whole, in contact with the Government of the United States. So soon as it is, the matters which now give you, and justly give you, cause for uneasiness will disappear. Just so soon as the business of this country has general, free, welcome access to the councils of Congress all friction between business and politics will disappear.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. With the consent of the Senator from Wyoming, I desire to send to the desk a telegram I have just received, bearing upon the question of the hearings recently held before the Ways and Means Committee, and ask that it be read for the information of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The telegram interferes with the question and its appropriateness, so I shall not ask it.

The Secretary read as follows:

HOLLAND, MICH., May 15, 1913.

Hon. WM. ALDEN SMITH, Washington, D. C.:

In behalf of our company and the beet-sugar industry of Michigan, we ask you to use your utmost endeavors to secure a hearing before the Finance Committee for this great Michigan industry. The sugar hearings before the House committee were worse than a farce, the Michigan interests, with an invstment of over $20,000,000, being given less than five minutes' time to present their case. The representative of our company was denied a hearing before that committee in January. He appeared in Washington in April, just before the opening of the present session of Congress, but was denied by the President and his advisors the privilege of presenting our views to them, and was told that the matter was foreclosed.

Not a man from Michigan, representing this industry, was allowed to talk to the President; and now the claim is set up that independent beet-sugar factories of Michigan do not oppose free sugar as provided in the House bill, since they have not protested. This is adding insult to injury. Free sugar will kill the beet-sugar industry, destroy a $2,000,000 investment which we have made in good faith, and give the eastern refiners a monopoly of the business without permanently reducing the price to the consumer. We believe we can establish this fact to the satisfaction of the members of the Senate Finance Committee if given an opportunity. May we urge you to insist that we now be given the right which has been denied us elsewhere.

BOARD OF DIRECTORS HOLLAND-ST. LOUIS SUGAR CO.,
C. M. MCLEAN, President.

The VICE PRESIDENT (at 4 o'clock p. m.). The time is up. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] to refer House bill No. 3321 to the Committee on Finance, to which there is an amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] as amended by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], the Senator from Pennsylvania concurring in the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin. The question is upon the amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask that the amendment be read as amended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. The amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] is to add to the motion of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] the following words:

And that said committee is hereby instructed to hold public hearings upon the bill and the schedules thereof.

The amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] to the amendment, and accepted by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], is to insert, after the word "thereof":

And the Senate Committee on Finance is further instructed to submit to all manufacturers who shall appear before said committee, or who shall file protests against any of the provisions of said bill or briefs or arguments relating to any of its provisions, the following interrogatories, the same to be answered separately and specifically, the answer to each question to be under oath and to be numbered to correspond with the question propounded:

First. What is the nature and use of the commodity which you produce?

Second. What are the raw materials used in its production?

Third. What is the amount of the production of this commodity in this country?

Fourth. What is the amount of the consumption of this commodity in this country?

Fifth. How many concerns are engaged in the manufacture of the commodity under consideration

Sixth. Who are the principal producers?

Seventh. What are the ruling market prices of this commodity in this country?

Eighth. What are the ruling market prices of this commodity in competing countries?

Ninth. What is the total cost of production per unit of product in this country?

Tenth. What is the total cost of production per unit of product in competing countries?

Eleventh. What is the percentage of the labor cost to the total cost of a unit of product in this country?

Twelfth. What is the percentage of the labor cost to the total cost of a unit of product in competing foreign countries?

Thirteenth. What is the cost of transportation to the principal markets in this country from the principal point of production in this country?

Fourteenth. What is the cost of transportation to the principal markets in this country from the principal points of production in competing foreign countries?

Fifteenth. What part of the existing duty represents the difference in the cost of production between this and competing foreign countries?

Sixteenth. What part of the existing duty represents the profit of the American manufacturer?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania consented that the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin should become a part of his amendment to the original motion. The vote will be upon the amendment, considered as one amendment. Those in favor will say "yea" and those opposed "nay." The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, if it is in order, I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin if he would not add three other interrogatories.

Mr. GALLINGER. That can not be done now.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I understand that the yeas and nays have been ordered upon this amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. JACKSON]. If I were permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. SMOOT (when Mr. DU PONT's name was called). The senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] is unavoidably detained from the Senate. He has a general pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. If the Senator from Delaware were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. BRYAN (when Mr. FLETCHER's name was called). My colleague [Mr. FLETCHER] is necessarily absent from the city. He is paired with the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. LEA (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT]. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. OLIVER (when Mr. PENROSE's name was called). My colleague [Mr. PENROSE] is necessarily absent from Washington. If he were present, he would vote "yea." He is paired with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. POMERENE (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA]. I am not advised how he would vote. If I were free to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I am paired on this question with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Arizona (when his name was called). The junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] has given notice of my pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. I entered into a general pair with that Senator, but withheld, by telephone to his house and to his office, the question now before the Senate, retaining my right to vote upon the question of reference with instructions; and on that question I feel at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. If I had the privilege of voting, I would vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). Upon this motion I am paired with the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH]. If he were present, I would vote "nay."

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when Mr. WARREN's name was called). My colleague [Mr. WARREN] is detained from the Chamber by important public business. He is paired with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. Save for that, I would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SHEPPARD. My colleague, the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], is necessarily absent. He has a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. GALLINGER. I was requested to announce that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] is paired with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA].

The result was announced—yeas 36, nays 41, as follows:

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now recurs on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] that the bill be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

PAINT CREEK COAL FIELDS, WEST VIRGINIA.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate resolution 37, providing for an investigation into the conditions in the Paint Creek coal fields, West Virginia.

Mr. KERN. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside, and I will ask that it be taken up on Monday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the unfinished business will be temporarily laid aside.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2441) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes; insists on its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2 to the bill, agrees to the further conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. FITZGERALD, Mr. SHERLEY, and Mr. GILLETT managers at the further conference on the part of the House.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. KERN. I have received two telegrams, in the nature of resolutions. They are very short, and I ask that they lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS BY HON. WILLIAM C. REDFIELD (S. DOC. NO. 37).

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have in my hand an address delivered by the Secretary of Commerce, William C. Redfield, on May 14, 1913, before the National Association of Employing Lithographers in this city. This speech has been referred to a number of times in the course of the debates in the Chamber and has excited a great deal of comment. I ask that it be printed as a public document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. POMERENE. There have been a great many demands for copies of this address, and I ask that 10,000 additional copies be printed.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator mean 10,000 copies in addition to the regular number, or does he mean 10,000 including the regular number?

Mr. POMERENE. I did not express myself as to that. I think it should be 10,000 copies in addition to the regular number.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know what the paper is, but if the Senator says it is really necessary, I will not object to the printing.

Mr. POMERENE. I know there is a very great demand for it, and the person with whom I have conferred has suggested it.

Mr. STONE. What is the usual number?

Mr. SMOOT. The usual number is 1,764. I will state to the Senator that out of that number, of course, copies are sent to all the libraries and the different departments, and so many to each Senator and each Member of the House of Representatives.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is so ordered, if there is no objection.

BUREAU OF WOMAN LABOR (S. DOC. NO. 38).

Mr. SMOOT. I have a letter addressed to Hon. William B. Wilson, Secretary of Labor, United States Department of Labor, signed by Mrs. Flora McDonald Thompson. It is very short, and as it is in the shape of a petition to establish a bureau of woman labor I ask that it be printed as a public document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

COMMITTEE ON POST OFFICES AND POST ROADS.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk, and I ask for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of a resolution, which the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 85), as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, or any subcommittee thereof, be authorized during the Sixty-third Congress to send for books and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer, at a price not to exceed $1 per printed page, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be pending before the said committee; that the committee may sit during the sessions or recesses of the Senate; and the expense thereof shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution is not now in order to be considered. It will have to be first referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, was there objection to the consideration of the resolution which I submitted? I do not care to have the resolution referred, because if we can not have the resolution passed so that the committee may have this permission by Monday we shall not need it. The resolution does not require to be referred at all. We have very important hearings set for Monday.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does not the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate meet to-morrow?

Mr. BANKHEAD. The Senate does not meet to-morrow.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, it is not a matter in the discretion of the Senate. The reference of such a resolution is prescribed by statute law.

Mr. STONE. I should like to have the resolution again read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again read the resolution.

The Secretary again read the resolution submitted by Mr. BANKHEAD.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, almost exactly a similar resolution to the one just read was presented to the Senate about a week ago by me under the instruction of the Committee on Indian Affairs and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. I asked immediate consideration for the resolution, but some Senator suggested that it must go—and I think he was right—to that committee. Notwithstanding that, I desire to say to the Senator that the Committee on Indian Affairs, practically without authority of the Senate, has been going on holding what the majority of the members of the committee consider important hearings, and in a way they are important. To-morrow the committee to which the resolution was referred will meet, as I am informed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], but the resolution can not be reported before Monday. I do not know whether the Senate will ever authorize the work that is now being done by the committee. If they do not, as I have told the members of the Committee on Indian Affairs, we will have to "chip in" and pay it, and it will amount to several hundred dollars.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator can have an item to cover the expenditure inserted in an appropriation bill, and there is no question that it will be passed.

Mr. JAMES. It is a small matter.

Mr. STONE. Not much—a few hundred dollars. But my object in saying what I have said is that, in view of what we were doing and what I said at that time of the importance of passing the resolution, the situation being exactly that which the Senator from Alabama now presents, the Senate declined to allow the immediate consideration of the resolution——

Mr. SMOOT. The Senate could not allow it under the law without a reference.

Mr. STONE (continuing). Because the statute law requires that such resolutions shall be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. I have been trying to get the Senator from Mississippi for a week to report the resolution; but he is so very busy with other matters and the members of his committee are so busy with other matters that he could not get them together until the regular day of meeting, which will be to-morrow. So we members of the Indian Affairs Committee are taking our chances as to whether the Senate will approve what is being done. Otherwise the members of the committee will have to contribute to the expense.

I think, under the rule and under the law, the resolution of the Senator from Alabama will have to go to the committee. I have said this so that my friend from Alabama will follow the distinguished example that I am presenting and go on with his hearings.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE ON EDUCATION.

Mr. BURTON. I ask unanimous consent to take from the table and to have considered House joint resolution 82.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio asks unanimous consent to take from the table and have considered House joint resolution 82, the title of which the Secretary will read.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (H. J. Res. 82) authorizing the President to accept an invitation to participate in an international conference on education.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Ohio?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. CHILTON. What is the resolution?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the joint resolution.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President is hereby authorized to accept an invitation extended by the Netherlands Government to the Government of the United States to participate by delegates in an international conference on education to be held at The Hague in the year 1913: Provided, That no appropriation shall be granted at any time for expenses of delegates or other expenses incurred in connection with said conference.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I will state that a joint resolution almost identical in language is on the calendar, being Calendar No. 25, Senate joint resolution No. 32. I take it that the proper procedure is to pass the House joint resolution and then ask that the Senate joint resolution be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me——

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I notice a provision in the joint resolution to the effect that no appropriation shall be granted for the expenses of delegates.

Mr. BURTON. It is carefully guarded so that there will be no expense to the Government.

Mr. NORRIS. I was wondering what the object was in omitting an appropriation. I should like to ask who will appoint these delegates?

Mr. BURTON. I suppose they will be appointed on the recommendation of the Commissioner of Education. I will state that this joint resolution came from the office of the Commissioner of Education.

Mr. NORRIS. It does not give him authority in terms to do so.

Mr. BURTON. No; but that authority, I take it, is implied, in view of the proposed acceptance of the invitation by the State Department.

Mr. NORRIS. It seems to me that it would be better for the resolution specifically to provide the number of delegates, then provide that the President shall appoint them, and appropriate for the payment of their expenses. I believe, if the conference is of sufficient importance to be international—and I have a good deal of sympathy with that kind of a movement—that we ought not to confine it merely to those who are able to pay their own expenses, but we should be able to get the highest character of delegates; and perhaps persons answering that description could not afford to go unless their expenses were paid.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I raised the point made by the Senator from Nebraska of the desirability of including some specification as to the appointment of delegates; but it was thought not best to make any specification in that regard.

As to the second point, that there should be an appropriation, if I can judge correctly of the temper of the Senate, it is very strongly against appropriations for international conferences. There have been an unusual number of them in recent years. Provision has been made in some way—I have asked no questions how—for paying the expenses of the representatives from this Government at the conference at The Hague, and I do not think it desirable under the circumstances to provide any appropriation.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, it is to be an international meeting on the subject of education, as I understand, something in which every citizen of the country is deeply interested; and while I would not favor an appropriation unless there was a limitation as to appointments, and so forth, and unless the President was given express authority to make the appointments, it seems to me that in a great international meeting on that subject we ought not to run the risk of having delegates selected whose expenses might be paid, perhaps, by some one having an interest in the result of the deliberations of that body, particularly when it is on the subject of education.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that if history repeats itself in this case, as it has done in many other cases, there will be a claim made for the expenses of transportation of the delegates who may go to this convention.

Mr. NORRIS. I will say to the Senator that I will not be in favor of paying that claim when it comes in, because, if we pay the expenses we ought to provide exactly the number who will be appointed, name the appointing power, and make it specific; otherwise, of course, we ought not to pay for it.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator is not on the Committee on Appropriations, the appropriation might go through, and he would never know of it.

Mr. NORRIS. He might find it out, and might not be able to prevent it; but, so far as his individual vote or influence is concerned, it would be against it, unless the resolution made compulsory some specific method of appointment and limited the number that could be appointed.

Mr. SMOOT. I rather sympathize with the statement the Senator has made. I simply stated that I did not think there need be any worry about the claim being made against the Government for the expenses.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator from Ohio will permit me——

Mr. BURTON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BACON. This matter comes through the State Department, with correspondence between the Netherlands Government and the officials of the State Department, and the apprehension of the Senator from Utah is entirely unfounded, or, rather, it will not materialize, from the fact that it is shown that the money has already been deposited for the purpose of paying these expenses by the parties who are promoting the conference.

Mr. SMOOT. The statement I made was based upon the statement that was made by the Senator from Nebraska. Of course, I had not read the resolution.

Mr. BACON. The resolution does not express it, but the papers which have come to the Committee on Foreign Relations from the State Department give the entire history of the matter and show that a certified check for the amount of $5,000, if I recollect correctly, has already been deposited for the purpose of meeting these expenses. Am I correct in my statement of the amount?

Mr. BURTON. I am not sure of the exact amount.

Mr. KENYON. Deposited by whom, Mr. President?

Mr. SWANSON. Miss Andrews, of Boston.

Mr. BACON. Yes. I will say, furthermore, that the lady herself came and I saw her personally.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator. I was unable to ascertain exactly what Senator had the floor, as six or seven Senators were standing, and I wish to ask for a moment of time. I was unable to tell who had the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] has the floor.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator from Ohio will permit me just a minute——

Mr. BURTON. I did not understand the interrogatory of the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. At the appropriate time I wish to secure the floor for a moment. I simply rose to ask the Senator who had the floor if he would not yield to me, not knowing who had the floor.

Mr. BURTON. There is a resolution pending which we desire to have disposed of, I will say to the Senator from Arizona. I now yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, this resolution was reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations. Miss Andrews, of Boston, has agreed to furnish all the expenses incident to this educational meeting. The resolution was passed through the House of Representatives with the distinct understanding and assurance given by Mr. FLOOD that no appropriation would ever be expected to be asked to defray the expenses incident to it, and I am satisfied that none will be asked.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I called up the House resolution. I take it that is clearly understood at the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the House resolution is before your committee.

Mr. BURTON. It is marked on the resolution, "Referred to the committee," but the Committee on Foreign Relations has reported favorably an identical resolution. House joint resolution 82 is the one which I have asked to have taken from the table and considered, and Senate joint resolution 32 has been favorably reported.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator from Ohio that the Chair is informed that this is the method of procedure, if the Senator will adopt it: To report this House resolution, put it upon its passage, and, when it is passed, indefinitely postpone the Senate resolution. That will keep the record straight.

Mr. BURTON. I have not so understood the procedure.

Mr. BACON. I want to suggest to the Senator from Ohio that if it is a fact, to which my attention has not previously been called, that this House resolution has already been referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, of course it can not be acted upon now by the Senate until there is a report from that committee.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, would not unanimous consent make it possible to consider this? It is in a position where the objection is a technical one rather than otherwise. There is on the calendar here, Order of Business No. 25, a resolution reported which is absolutely identical in substance. I take it that by unanimous consent it could be considered.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, why not make a motion to discharge the Committee on Foreign Relations from further consideration of the matter and have the bill reported to the Senate, and then ask that the Senate substitute it for the Senate resolution?

Mr. BURTON. I make that motion, Mr. President—that the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations be discharged from further consideration of House joint resolution No. 82.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the Committee on Foreign Relations be discharged from the further consideration of House joint resolution No. 82, which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (H. J. Res. 82) authorizing the President to accept an invitation to participate in the international conference on education.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. SHIVELY. Let me ask whether this resolution was not reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations?

Mr. BURTON. Yes; it was.

Mr. SHIVELY. Then, why discharge the committee?

Mr. BURTON. It could have been taken from the committee immediately when it came over from the House, but it seems a reference of it was made to the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SHIVELY. Oh! The Senator's proposition is to discharge the Committee on Foreign Relations from the further consideration of the House resolution?

Mr. BURTON. Yes; and then to pass the House resolution.

Mr. SHIVELY. I understand.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request?

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BURTON. I ask unanimous consent that Order of Business No. 25, Senate joint resolution No. 32, be indefinitely postponed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that action will be taken.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. KERN. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

ARMOR PLATE FOR NAVAL VESSELS.

Mr. BACON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I presume that motion is not debatable, and, of course, I could not be heard now except by unanimous consent.

Mr. BACON. I will withhold the motion, Mr. President.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, heretofore, to wit, on the 17th of March, 1913, and again on May 8 I introduced the following resolution (S. Res. 78):

Whereas bids were opened by the Secretary of the Navy in February, 1913, for furnishing armor plate for the dreadnought Pennsylvania; and

Whereas the representatives of three firms manufacturing armor plate in the State of Pennsylvania, while pretending to bid as competitors, after a conference submitted bids which did not vary more than $1 per ton; and

Whereas the then Secretary of the Navy, notwithstanding an intimation made on the floor of the Senate of the United States that it was alleged there existed collusion among different manufacturers to advance the price of armor plate and divide the profits of the contract, awarded the contract on March 3, 1913, by dividing, for all practical purposes, the award of 8,000 tons of armor plate among the three companies; and

Whereas it is alleged that this action of the said firms reveals that they comprise an Armor Plate Trust, and that the price named in the contract awarded by the Secretary of the Navy is in the neighborhood of about $25 per ton higher than the previous awards by the Department of the Navy for armor plate: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, directed to forward to the Senate at as early a date as practicable a report on the amount of armor plate ordered by the Department of the Navy during the past 25 years, the prices paid in each award, and the names of the firms or corporations to whom the contracts were awarded.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I thought the Senator simply wished to make a statement.

Mr. ASHURST. I shall occupy only three or four minutes.

Mr. BACON. Does the Senator desire action on the matter at this time?

Mr. ASHURST. No; I shall not ask action on the resolution this evening.

Mr. BACON. I withdraw my objection, then. I thought the Senator wanted to take it up for action.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the distinguished Senator from Georgia; I am indebted to him for many favors, and his courtesy in withholding his motion at this time is especially appreciated.

Doubting, as I do, an opportunity to secure the early passage of this resolution, I therefore lay before the Senate and before the country the following facts: When the bids were called for, or proposals were published asking for bids for furnishing 8,000 tons of armor plate for the dreadnought Pennsylvania, three bids were submitted—one by the Carnegie Steel Co., which is a subsidiary to the United States Steel Co.; one by the Bethlehem Steel Co., of Bethlehem, Pa.; and the third by the Midvale Steel Co., of Philadelphia, Pa. These companies were represented in this city by President Dinkey, of the Carnegie Co.; Vice President Johnston, of the Bethlehem Co.; and Vice President Petrie, of the Midvale Co. These gentlemen all stopped at one of the leading hotels here and were frequently in conference. As a consequence, when the bids were opened it occasioned no surprise to find that the bids did not vary a dollar a ton among these three companies.

When the bids were opened not only was it ascertained that the bids did not vary a dollar a ton among the three companies, pretending to be competitors, but the bids were, in fact, about $34 per ton higher than the price received for armor plate by these three companies on the last previous contract. On the 28th day of February, 1913, before any of the bids had been accepted or the contract approved, and when the United States Senate was considering an item in the naval appropriation bill as follows:

Increase of the Navy; armor and armament: Toward the armor and armament for vessels heretofore and herein authorized, to be available until expended, $11,508,309—

I introduced an amendment to that item in the naval appropriation bill as follows:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy shall forward to Congress at the earliest practicable date a full report of all bids received by him relating to the purchase of armor, ship plates, and structural steel for the battleship or dreadnought purported to be named, when completed, the Pennsylvania; and that the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, directed not to award any contract for the purchase of steel, armament, armor, or ship plates until further directed by Congress.

I introduced this amendment in view of the apparent collusion of these three companies, which companies, I might add, comprise the Armor Plate Trust, as it certainly seemed inadvisable that the contract should be awarded without some investigation, especially in view of the fact that it requires about three or four years to construct a battleship, and the armor plate for these ships will not be required for nearly a year. It seemed obvious that no harm could come by a delay of a few weeks until the matter could be investigated. But a point of order was made against the amendment I proposed, which point of order was sustained by the then presiding officer.

I do not especially complain about the ruling of the Chair, as I have some doubt as to whether the amendment was cognizable under the rules at that time, and I find no fault with the rule, although in that particular case it happened to defeat a wholesome modification in the proposed law. Notwithstanding the intimation made on the floor of the Senate that there was apparent collusion among the three pretending competitors, and notwithstanding the complaint that the bids were about $34 per ton higher than the price received for armor plate on the last previous contract, the then Secretary of the Navy, in the expiring hours of a defeated, not to say discredited, administration, accepted the bids, and on the 3d day of March, 1913, let the contract by dividing, for all practical purposes, the 8,000 tons of armor plate among the three companies pretending to be competitors. Without further emphasizing the unexplained and peculiar haste on the part of the retiring Secretary of the Navy to facilitate these companies comprising the Steel Trust, I desire to state that the result of letting such contracts was and is that this Government, if the contract shall be enforced, will be required to pay $454 per ton for class A armor plate when heretofore this Government has never paid a higher price than $420 per ton for class A armor plate. But, Mr. President, the apparent collusion among the pretended competitors and the additional $34 per ton to be paid by this Government for the armor plate are not the only facts relating to that transaction which should be exhibited to the Senate and the country.

Speaking upon this subject in the Senate on May 14, I stated the following: "Our Republican friends on the other side of the aisle have recently fulminated very much and thundered in the index over public hearings, and if they be sincere they will all vote to adopt the resolution I have introduced, so that the American people may see where their money goes. You claim you want 'light.' If you assist in passing this resolution, you will see how the Steel Trust mulcted this Government to the tune of $1,600,000 in furnishing the armor plate that is to be used in the building of the superdreadnought Pennsylvania."

A Senator subsequently said to me that he hoped I would explain just how and in what manner the Public Treasury had been mulcted to the amount of $1,600,000 with respect to the armor plate for the Pennsylvania, and I am sorry to say it is a fact that the armor plate for the Pennsylvania, under these bids as accepted by the former Secretary of the Navy, will cost this Government just $1,600,000 too much, and for the following reasons: The price to be paid by the Government under these contracts is $454 per ton for 8,000 tons of class A armor plate. I have no funds at my disposal with which to employ experts to ascertain at what precise figure armor plate may be purchased, moreover, the best experts in armor are not to be expected to come before Congress and give their knowledge of the cost of armor plate or to prove the inferiority of armor plate furnished for all or for any battleships, when in so doing they would lose thousands of dollars, would be discharged from their present situations, and could obtain no further employment from large steel manufacturers; but I have obtained information from what I conceive to be a reliable source that if Congress will offer the proper compensation and protection to experts, they are able to and will furnish evidence showing conclusively that this class A armor plate may be manufactured at large profit at the price of $254 per ton. If this be true, and many persons believe it can be substantiated, this Government is paying exactly $200 per ton too much on the 8,000 tons of armor plate to be used in the Pennsylvania, which makes an excess of $1,600,000 that we are paying for the armor plate in this one battleship.

No Senator will forget it is a matter of record that the Carnegie Steel Co. has heretofore furnished defective armor plate, was convicted of defrauding the Government of nearly $500,000 in an armor-plate contract, and finally compromised the matter by paying, as I remember, about $160,000 as a penalty for its fraudulent transaction.

Therefore the following deplorable situation is before us: Only three companies in the United States manufacture armor plate, namely, the Carnegie Co., the Bethlehem Co., and the Midvale Co. They pretend to compete, when in truth they are in collusion among themselves. They submit bids for 8,000 tons of armor plate at $454 per ton—which is $34 per ton higher than has ever heretofore been paid for such armor plate—when in fact it would be possible to demonstrate that this same armor plate should cost the Government but $254 per ton. The following figures will be found interesting: Eight thousand tons of armor plate at $454 per ton equals $3,632,000; but if this armor plate can be furnished at $254 per ton, the Government should be paying $2,032,000 instead of $3,632,000, which would be a clear saving to the Public Treasury of $1,600,000 on one ship alone. In addition to the fact that these companies are furnishing armor at an extortionate price there exists also an uncertainty as to how much defective armor has been furnished or is being furnished. There exist grave doubts as to whether these companies have furnished good armor plate to the Government and not armor that will prove treacherous and defective in the time of the Nation's greatest need.

Although the Navy Department some 12 or 14 years ago used considerable care in attempting to conceal the information, it is nevertheless a fact that from certain tests made—which tests were not made voluntarily by the Navy Department, but under pressure from Congress—it was ascertained that armor plate which was supposed to be the heaviest and strongest was destroyed by an outside explosion of a single Gathmann high-explosive shell, and no recognition of the result of such tests was ever definitely or adequately reported to Congress. I therefore make this statement at this time and feel that nothing should preclude my laying these facts before the Senate and before the American people, to the end that the day may soon come when the United States shall not be obliged to submit to the extortions of this grasping Steel Trust, which extends its hungry and larcenous fingers into the Public Treasury and from the people's revenue extracts on one contract alone $1,600,000; and even then no man knows whether these companies furnish sound armor plate or defective armor plate.

I see around me Senators earnest and honest in trying to perform their public duties. They observe, as they should, every item in an appropriation bill. I had the pleasure recently to serve on one of the great committees of the Senate (I will not relate what occurred before the committee, because that is against the rules) where Senators closely scrutinized every item in an appropriation bill. That was proper and as it should be; but why not chase large game also? Why scrutinize the salary of some overworked and underpaid postal employee and ignore the fact that a defeated administration in its last hours, over protest and with what I might characterize as suspicious haste, executed a contract on the 3d of March which provides that this Government should pay $454 per ton for class A armor plate when the Government, beyond doubt, could manufacture its own armor plate at about $254 per ton, and, in addition thereto, know that there was no defective material in these great ships, which, eastward and westward with sheen of crystal mail, we send forth upon the ocean to guard well the gleaming strand of this, our native land? I have laid these facts before the Senate in the hope that they might attract attention to the advisability of the Government making its own armor plate and thus be relieved from the extortions and larcenies of this Steel Trust.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. ASHURST. I am just about to conclude. I hold the floor only by virtue of the kindness of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], and I feel that I can not yield to anyone so long as I hold the floor by his kindness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. May the Chair inquire whether the Senator desires the resolution to lie on the table or to be referred?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I can not at this moment ask for the adoption of the resolution, because it has always been my training never to ask for action on a proceeding, motion, or any other matter to which there is objection unless the persons making the objections are present. Observing that the Senator who made the objection the other day is not in his seat at this particular time, I do not ask for the adoption of the resolution. Moreover, I can not ask for action on the resolution at this time, for I obtained the floor upon the understanding that I would not ask for the adoption of the resolution this evening.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator still wants the resolution to lie on the table?

Mr. ASHURST. I should like to have it lie on the table. And I now give notice that at the earliest opportunity I may secure the floor properly under the rules I shall ask for the adoption of this resolution.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, May 16, 1913.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Infinite Spirit, everywhere present, working in and through the hearts of men, grant that we may ever be in a receptive mood, that the kingdom of heaven may be ours to enjoy, to advance, the goal of which is perfection for the individual, the race; that evil may depart that good may triumph, and Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven. For Thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2441) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes; had further insisted upon its amendment No. 2, disagreed to by the House of Representatives; had asked a further conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and had appointed Mr. MARTIN of Virginia, Mr. OVERMAN, and Mr. WARREN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] calls up the conference report on the sundry civil bill. Does the gentleman desire the report to be read or the statement?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Both. They are very short.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will read both the report and the statement.

There was no objection.

The conference report and accompanying statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 17).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2441) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 3.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same.

The committee of conference have been unable to agree on amendment numbered 2.

JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
SWAGAR SHERLEY,
FREDK. H. GILLETT,
Managers on the part of the House.

THOMAS S. MARTIN,
LEE S. OVERMAN,
F. E. WARREN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT OF MANAGERS ON THE PART OF THE HOUSE.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 2441) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year 1914, and for other purposes, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

On amendment No. 1: Makes a verbal correction in the bill.

On amendment No. 3: Restores the title "Department of Commerce and Labor," as proposed by the House.

On amendment No. 2: Relating to the Board of Managers for the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, the committee of conference have been unable to agree.

JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
SWAGAR SHERLEY,
FREDK. H. GILLETT,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote on the adoption of the conference report.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the Clerk report Senate amendment No. 2.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would inquire if a complete agreement was reached, excepting the one amendment?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; except the amendment No. 2.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report Senate amendment No. 2.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hereafter vacancies occuring in the membership of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers shall not be filled until the whole number of members of such board is reduced to five, and thereafter the number of members constituting said board shall not exceed five.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further insist on its disagreement with the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] moves that the House further insist on its disagreement with the Senate amendment. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

Mr. HINDS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to move to recede and concur.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HINDS] makes the preferential motion to recede and concur.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, how much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. HINDS. About three minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HINDS] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HINDS. In moving to concur in the Senate amendment I desire to present the views of the veterans who are living in the homes and also their friends among the Grand Army and others who are interested in them. One of these homes is located in Maine, and the department commander of the Grand Army of that State has protested against the change of management.

The management of the various branches of the soldiers' home has been successful, and, what is more, they have been real homes for the unfortunate veterans who have no other homes. When the misfortunes of those veterans who have been obliged to go to the homes are considered, the management has been wonderfully successful. With officials chosen from their own comrades, with an organization analogous to that of the volunteer army of which they were a part, they are now at the close of a career of usefulness which, in the nature of things, can not now last more than a few years. Such being the case, why can not the organization still continue with the local control and the local sympathy? It is not demonstrated that a change in the number of managers will induce greater efficiency, and it is certain to lessen the sympathy between the inmates and the organization.

Speaking especially for the soldiers of the Augusta Home, it may be said that the manager is a distinguished volunteer officer who went out in 1861 and served through the war. His associates are of the same distinguished class. They know their more unfortunate comrades, have sympathy with them, and a desire to so manage the homes that the last years of the inmates may be as happy and peaceful as possible. Therefore I hope that the amendment of the Senate will be concurred in.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask my colleague, the chairman of the committee, just what the contention is between the Senate and the House upon this proposed amendment?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Senate has stricken out the provision.

Mr. GOULDEN. What is the present provision that exists now in the law? How many men are provided for?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, there are at present 11 managers of the Soldiers' Home.

Under the statute one of them must be a resident of a State or Territory west of the Rocky Mountains. They are elected by Congress. They must be citizens of the United States, and all must be residents of States which furnished organized bodies of soldiers to the Government in the Civil War commencing in 1861, and no two of them shall be residents of the same State. No person who gave aid or countenance to the rebellion shall ever be eligible. The term of each of these managers is six years, or until a successor is elected.

Mr. GOULDEN. As I understand, no salaries are paid except to the president and treasurer.

Mr. HAY. Only to the secretary-treasurer. The president does not receive any salary.

Mr. GOULDEN. The only one who receives a salary is the secretary-treasurer?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. May I urge gentlemen to talk loudly enough so that they may be heard 10 or 20 feet away? We could not hear what has been taking place over there. I suppose it is in reference to this conference report.

Mr. GOULDEN. Could not the gentleman hear me?

Mr. MANN. No. I always like to hear the gentleman.

Mr. GOULDEN. Thank you.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the Board of Managers of the National Soldiers' Homes consists of 11 members.

Mr. MANN. That is under the law, but not in fact now.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; in fact.

Mr. MANN. I think we have not filled the last vacancy or two.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There are three expired terms, but under the law the members hold on until their successors are qualified.

Mr. MANN. I did not know that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I just read it.

Mr. MANN. That was one of the things we could not hear.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The term of office of these managers shall be for six years, or until a successor is elected. The terms of three of them expired in 1912. Their successors have not been elected.

Mr. Speaker, there are 10 branches of the National Soldiers' Home, and under the arrangement that has existed up to this time one of the members of the board is chosen president, and one member of the board is assigned as a local manager for each branch. The result is that in the administration of the affairs of these various homes there is practically no board action. The manager assigned to a particular home presents in the meeting of the board the matters affecting the home to which he is assigned, and it is very rarely that any action is taken adverse to his recommendation; so that instead of the benefits of board action there is practically a manager elected for each home, and his administration is not controlled by the other members.

Within the past few years there has been some complaint of the management of the homes. There has been complaint at times of the character of the food and of the treatment accorded to the members of the homes. After investigations covering several years the House finally, upon the recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations, several times adopted a provision providing for a reduction in the size of the board, so that there would no longer be that local attachment or sentiment about each member and so the board might conduct its affairs in a more businesslike manner.

In the first session of the last Congress the House adopted such a provision, but because of the vacancies that were about taking place in 1912 the Senate refused to agree to the provisions.

In the sundry civil bill as it passed Congress in the last session this provision was inserted in the House, and the Senate agreed to it, and it was in the bill when it went to the President. It now appears, however, that there will be four vacancies in 1914, and there is on the part of those whose terms will expire at that time some opposition to this provision going into effect. The provision will not affect the election of successors in the place of those whose terms expired three years ago, three in number, but it will eliminate four places the vacancies in which will exist in 1914.

I have no personal interest in anybody who is on the board or who desires to be on the board; but, as a result of the investigations that have been made into the administration of the homes, investigations connected with the estimates for the money required for the homes, I was convinced and I am still convinced that in the interest of good administration and in the interest of the old soldiers themselves who are the beneficiaries of the maintenance of these institutions, that it is very desirable to reduce the membership of this board.

The time is very near at hand when some of these branches must be discontinued. The question to be thrashed out in the board will be one that will not be easy. It will be somewhat difficult to decide as to the particular branches that must be abandoned first. If the board is to continue with each home having a representative, it will be very difficult to have such action taken as will represent the very best thing that should be done, while if a board is so constituted that no one member can be said to speak for any particular branch, then, in the interest of the old soldiers, when the homes must be abandoned and transfers made, it is quite likely that the ones abandoned first will be those which are most undesirable or least suited for the purposes of the homes.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. GOULDEN. What are the expenses in connection with the various managers? Do they travel from time to time to their respective homes and supervise and look after the homes—take an interest in them personally? If so, at whose expense, and about what is that expense?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not recall. I do not think the expense attached to the maintenance of the board of 11 members is of such a character that it makes any difference at all. There are some traveling expenses, but the amount is not sufficiently large to make it a matter to be considered in determining what should be done.

Mr. GOULDEN. If my colleague will permit a statement, as one of the managers of the New York State Soldiers and Sailors' Homes I will say that our members have been diminishing very rapidly. Two years ago we had 2,250, and now we are down to 1,600, and the death rate is such that it is only a question at the outside of about 10 years when the home will have to be turned over to other purposes. So, I take it that the position assumed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] is the correct one, that we must sooner or later abolish or combine some of these homes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is an additional reason why the population of the various branches will be reduced other than because of the excessive death rate, and that is the belief that as a result of the pension legislation which was enacted recently many men who otherwise would have remained in the homes will now be able to remain outside. That has been stated frequently, and that is the belief.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Speaker, that has not had the material effect that we expected or anticipated. It has had some, but very much less than was expected at the time the Sherwood bill was passed.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. Has the gentleman any information as to whether there has been a general decrease in these several homes, speaking collectively, during the last five years?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not recall the figures. I do not recall just at present whether there has been an increase or a decrease. It has varied. A year or two ago I believe the population ran up very high. I have not looked the matter up recently with sufficient care to be able to make an accurate statement.

Mr. SLOAN. In the progress of the government of the home, has the work in supervising these homes been materially reduced so that 5 men can do as well as 10 or 11?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The conviction of the members of the committee who looked into the matter is that they will do better.

Mr. SLOAN. Has the plan heretofore been that these several members have had charge or oversight of the particular institutions somewhere near their own residences?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That has been the policy.

Mr. SLOAN. One of the effects of this change would be to isolate the membership somewhat from the institutions?

Mr. FITZGERALD. One of the differences would be that instead of having 1 man responsible, and his judgment accepted by the other 10, 5 members would all feel sufficiently responsible themselves to be informed regarding each home, and each would thus exercise his own judgment in disposing of the business connected with it.

Mr. SLOAN. Has the board itself made any recommendation as to the reduction of its own membership?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think the board itself adopted resolutions recently opposing this change, but they were not unanimously adopted. The president of the board has been in favor of the change. Last year, if I recall, Mr. Cox, of Ohio, took considerable interest in the Dayton Home, in his own town. He made a number of speeches about it both in the last Congress and in the previous one. During the examinations about this matter, Mr. Wadsworth, the president of the board, was before the Committee on Appropriations, and Mr. Cox examined Mr. Wadsworth as follows:

Mr. COX. The question I am going to ask you may be outside of the scope of this hearing, but inasmuch as it affects the administration of the homes I think it is proper. I would like for you to state to the committee, if you will, your opinion as to what should be the size of the board.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Looking at it from a business point of view, it is entirely too large.

Mr. COX. From my observation, and I have given some little attention, at least, to the administration of the homes, I think that a mistake has been made in designating some man as the resident manager.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There is no provision in the law for a "local manager"——

Mr. COX (interposing). As a result of that, might not this condition exist: You might have an incompetent governor; you might have a pretty general condition of inefficiency in one of the branches, and yet, because of this "senatorial" courtesy, the board might not make the changes which, in the opinion and judgment of the board, ought to be made.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think that has been the case.

Mr. COX. How large ought the board to be, in your opinion?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It should consist of six members, and no more. They should elect their president, and then there would be five members on the floor, so to speak.

Mr. COX. That would remove all local considerations?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. COX. And that would not operate to the detriment of the board?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is my own individual judgment, and I think several members of the board concur in that view also.

That is one statement that has been made. At different times others of a somewhat similar character have been made. The committee was convinced, as a result of the hearings upon the various items, that the board should be reduced in the interest of efficient administration.

Mr. LOBECK. I have been informed that these local men, situated in the different localities throughout the country, are very convenient for the old soldier who would make application to go to these homes in that he would get his reply that much sooner, the local man being in the neighborhood where these homes are.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, there is nothing in that at all. The old soldiers are scattered all through the United States, and there is no particular advantage in writing to a man, for instance, in St. Louis rather than Chicago, in making their applications. That same argument was used against the abolishment of the pension agencies and the payment of pensions from Washington, and nobody gives it serious consideration.

Mr. LOBECK. There has been some complaint of that out in our direction.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think that is one of the reasons suggested, yet, in my opinion, it is of no importance, because if a man is located in a town 25 miles away from the place where the application is to be made it makes little difference whether he is 500 miles away. The application would probably be by mail.

Mr. McGILLICUDDY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield me some time?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. McGILLICUDDY. Mr. Speaker, one of these homes is located in my State. It covers not only the people of my State but the people of all New England, and our people are very deeply interested in this proposition. As I look at it, there is no economy in cutting down the membership of this board from 11 to 5. The members of the board get no salary whatever, outside of the president and treasurer, who would be retained with the smaller board, consequently there would be no economy in cutting down the board from 11 to 5. There would be no economy even in the matter of traveling expenses. Eleven men now constitute the board, and one man is located in the vicinity of each of these boards and in close communication with the home, so that his travel is very small, and if five men, under the proposed management, have to travel all about the country, of course it is very easy to see that their travel will more than exceed that of 11 men, as the board is now composed. Now, the old soldiers are very much interested in this matter. It is true, of course, that in time these homes will have to be abolished, but I beg to say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] that that time has not yet arrived. The old soldiers in the home in my State now practically approach 2,000. They love that home as much as you and I love our homes. All of the association in the world that appeals to the heart and the memory of the old soldier is located in that home, the only home he has got on the face of this earth, and I say it is too early now to give them notice to quit or evict them from the place where they have so long lived.

Now, under the present arrangement each home has a local manager, a man who is in direct sympathy with the inmates of each home, a man who will lend a sympathetic eye to their condition and a sympathetic ear to their appeals for justice and relief in case of suffering. Remove that man from them and then they have to appeal to a distant board and not to one of their own comrades who is in direct communication with them. Now, I have in my hand some letters which have been sent to me. I will not take the time of this House to read them, but I want to read one, because the gentleman writing it is so eminent in this country that I know his words will weigh greatly on the Members of this House. This is a letter from Gen. Warner, of Missouri, an ex-Member of this House and an ex-United States Senator, and it was directed to Gen. Joseph S. Smith, the local manager of the home in my State, and reads as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 9, 1913.

Gen. JOSEPH S. SMITH,
The Richmond, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR GENERAL: In reply to your inquiry as to my judgment as to whether or not it would be to the best interest of the members of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers to reduce the membership of the board of managers to five, I am decidedly of the opinion that such a change would not be to the best interests of the home.

The board as now constituted consists of 14 members, the President of the United States, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, and the Secretary of War, together with 11 members appointed by Congress. Thus it will be seen that there are 11 active members of the board of managers. This gives one member, known as the local manager, to each of the 10 branches of the home, leaving the other active member of the board for the position of president, with supervision of the general affairs of the home. The local manager pays frequent visits to his branch of the home, taking a special interest therein without losing interest in the other branches. These local managers at the meeting of the board make valuable suggestions and requests for such changes as are necessary for the happiness and contentment of the twenty-odd thousand members. To reduce the board of managers to five would, as a natural consequence, concentrate more power at headquarters of the board in New York. My experience after eight years' service on the board convinces me that this change is not desirable. In this view I am supported by a resolution unanimously adopted a few weeks since at a meeting of the board of managers at the Marion Branch.

In giving you thus briefly my views on the question asked, I have only one purpose in view, and that is the welfare of my comrades who are members of the home. I am not interested in the appointment of anyone as a member of the board, nor am I even a receptive candidate for reappointment.

With kindest regards, believe me, sincerely,

WM. WARNER.

Now, this is a letter from a man who has no desire to become a member of the board, entirely disinterested, who has served upon that board for a term of eight long years. No man in this country to-day is in closer touch with the necessities and the needs of all kinds of the old soldiers in these various branches of the homes than ex-Senator Warner, and I trust that the membership of this House will not be a party to giving the old soldiers, twenty-odd thousand of them, in the only homes they have on the top of God's earth, a notice to quit before, in the nature of things and in God's own good time, it will be necessary for them to leave there. [Applause.] I now desire to insert the remainder of the letters I have received.

The letters are as follows:

LAFAYETTE, IND., April 21, 1913.

SIR: I have the honor to state that I think it will be a serious mistake and an irreparable injury to the welfare of the veterans in the National Soldiers' Home to reduce the number of managers to five. Under the present arrangement one of the managers (designated as local manager) is given special supervision of a branch of the home. This enables him frequently to visit the branch of which he is local manager, confer with the governor and other officers, and personally inspect the quarters and all the operations connected with the branch. In this way he picks up valuable information which he is able to suggest to other managers in their meetings. If the number of managers was reduced to five, it would be impossible to have the branches visited except at stated meetings of the board, unless the president or some of the other managers voluntarily took it upon themselves to visit the branches during the intervals betwen the meetings of the board.

Each manager serves without compensation, except his necessary traveling expenses. Each one resides only a comparatively short distance from the branch of which he is local manager and is able to frequently visit it with very small expense.

I can speak of this matter disinterestedly, as my term will expire in about a year, and on account of my age, even if a reappointment were available, I will not wish to serve longer.

Yours, very truly,

EDWIN P. HAMMOND,
Manager National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

NATIONAL HOME FOR DISABLED VOLUNTEER SOLDIERS,
Bangor, Me., April 16, 1913.

DEAR SIR: Having been requested to give my views regarding the proposed legislation to reduce the number of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers to five, I would state:

First of all it should be stated that this amendment was introduced without having any consideration by the board of managers or by any officers of the several branches of the National Home. Such consideration, it seems to me, the amendment should have received, for it means a change in the administration of the affairs of the several branches, an administration that has marked the history of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers in its gradual development from a single branch in 1866 to the nine branches and the Battle Mountain Sanitarium at the present time, when to each of these a member of the board is assigned as local manager. Manifestly this development of the position of the local manager has been in the interest of efficiency. His residence is reasonably near the branch, so near as to admit of frequent visits and a familiarity with its affairs. How much this means to its officers because of its opportunities for consultation, and also to the members of the branch, who thus come into personal contact with the local manager, can be readily seen. I am confident that both the officers of the several branches, as well as the old soldiers themselves, would deprecate the proposed change. It would destroy largely the personal interest represented now in the local manager and centralize the affairs of the several branches at headquarters of the board in New York. This does not seem to me to be called for, either on the ground of efficiency or economy. As to efficiency, my experience has taught me that a single branch is as large a field as any one member of the board can properly cultivate, while as to economy it is sufficient to say that the members of the board as now constituted serve without pay.

If I were to summarize the advantages of the present arrangement, I should say:

1. It secures to each branch of the National Home a very close and desirable relation between the officers of the branch and the board of managers in its governing capacity. The local manager, because of his frequent personal visits, has such an intimate acquaintance with the needs of the branch which he represents that the officers are assured that the interests of the branch will be sympathetically and intelligently presented to the board. The action of the board also, whatever it may be, will be sure to reach the officers of the branch in such a way as to secure the fullest possible information. An intermediary of this kind can not but conduce to harmony and efficiency in the management of the affairs of the several branches.

2. The present arrangement likewise provides an intermediary between the members of the home in its several branches and the board of managers in its governing capacity. Of the board as a whole they see but little. There is an annual visit, it is true, but on these occasions the members of the branches do not come into such close personal contact with the members of the board as they do with the local manager of the branch with which they are connected. They see him often. They become personally acquainted with him and look upon him as a friend and a comrade with whom they have come into sympathetic relations. A change that would in any way lessen this feeling on the part of the old soldiers would not, in my opinion, prove otherwise than detrimental. What they crave above everything else is sympathy, and the local manager is the one to whom naturally they look for a sympathetic representation of their interests at the meetings of the board.

It is generally wise to let well enough alone. For nearly half a century the Government has cared for the disabled volunteer soldiers of the Civil War. The history of the National Home provided for these disabled soldiers is one of which the Government has reason to be proud. There is no call for the proposed change either on the part of the board of managers or of any of the officers and members of the several branches, and until there is such a call Congress may well hesitate to take any action whatever.

For these reasons I feel it my duty, in the interest of and for the welfare, comfort, and happiness of the old veterans committed to our care, to most earnestly and strongly pray that the amendment be not enacted.

Very respectfully, JOSEPH S. SMITH,
Manager N. H. D. V. S., Local Manager Eastern Branch.

Allow me to add that it would seem that the expenditure of more than $4,000,000 appropriated by Congress annually for the support of these homes would naturally be better looked after by a majority of a board of 11 (6) than by that of a board of 5 (3). This is simply a business proposition.

CAMBRIDGE, MASS., April 17, 1913.

To the CHAIRMAN OF THE COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS.

SIR: I have learned with surprise that it is proposed, by an amendment to the sundry civil bill, not to fill existing vacancies in the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, or any vacancies hereafter occurring, until the number is reduced to five, and that this number shall thenceforward constitute the entire board.

As an old soldier, and one who until July last (when I resigned on account of age) had served as chaplain of the Eastern Branch of the National Home, I sincerely hope that this amendment will not pass. I am sure that if the members of the home could have a voice in this matter it would be a unanimous voice against the proposed change. The present average of these old soldiers is about 71 years. What they need and what they most desire is sympathy. They have no use for merely barrack life. What they want is a home, and such a home as Congress intended the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers should be.

The present arrangement as to local managers gives to each branch a representation in the board. This means that each branch has its own local manager; that is, one upon whom rests the duty of looking after the interests of the old soldiers there, frequently visiting the branch, meeting the members personally, sympathizing with them in their varied experiences, opening his ear to their complaints and his eye to their needs; in a word, showing himself a friend in all his relations with them.

The local managers I have known have been such men. The suggested changes would abolish this relation of the members of the board to the several branches of the home. The five members of the board, under the proposed arrangement, would be obliged to confine their attention to business details wholly. As one deeply interested in the welfare of the old soldiers, therefore, and as one who has had an opportunity of knowing how generously Congress has provided for these aged veterans of the Civil War, I trust that Congress will not now deprive any one of the branches of the home of the service of a local manager. To do this will be to deprive the old soldiers of a friend they love and to whom they look for that sympathy which they crave.

Very truly, yours,
HENRY S. BURRAGE,
Late Chaplain Eastern Branch,
National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

Mr. JONES. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. McGILLICUDDY. Certainly.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman speaks of local managers. Does the gentleman desire to create the impression that there is a manager for each one of these homes appointed from and residing in the locality in which the home is located?

Mr. McGILLICUDDY. Not necessarily. Each local manager is a member of the general board, and, as a rule, as I understand it, the local manager comes from the vicinity of his local home. It is not legally necessary that he should, but it is regarded as proper.

Mr. JONES. I will say to the gentleman that it is not only not legally necessary that he shall be a resident of the State wherein the home is located, but that it is, in some cases at least, legally necessary that he shall not be a resident of that State. The law governing these appointments reads as follows:

And be it further enacted, That the Board of Managers shall be composed of the President and Secretary of War and Chief Justice of the United States ex officio, during their term of office, together with nine other citizens of the United States, not Members of Congress, no two of whom shall be residents of the same State, but who shall be residents of States which furnished organized bodies of soldiers to aid in the war for the suppression of the rebellion.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. MCGILLICUDDY] has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield two minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. JONES. Now, as a matter of fact, the most popular, if not the largest, soldiers' home in the United States is that of Hampton, Va., which is in the district which I have the honor to represent. The so-called local manager for that home resides in the State of New Jersey, and the law will not permit the appointment of a resident of Virginia. Does not the gentleman think that the law ought to be changed in this respect? If we are going to have local managers, as he thinks is necessary for the good of the homes, does he not think the law should be changed so that the local manager for the Hampton Home should come from the State of Virginia?

Mr. McGILLICUDDY. We will cross that bridge when we get to it. That is not before the House now.

Mr. JONES. If the gentleman be correct in his contention—and I take no issue with him as to that—should not the local manager for the popular home which is located in the district I represent be a resident of Virginia and not of New Jersey? The Hampton Home is as much entitled to a local manager as any other home.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has half an hour remaining.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to drag into this discussion the individual members of the board. The letter read by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. MCGILLICUDDY] was written by a gentleman who is at present a member of the board. His term expired in 1912. The House since that time has passed a resolution proposing members for the vacancies. It went to the Senate, and the name of Maj. Warner was not in the House resolution, but when the resolution was reported from the Senate his name had been substituted for one of the names proposed by the House. And it must be borne in mind that Maj. Warner, while he has been vigorously and actively interested in the welfare of the soldier, is a member of the board whose actions during the last six or seven years have been such that, in the opinion of those who have been so located as not to have any particular interest in a particular home or manager, makes desirable the change proposed. Included among those members were one from Dayton, Ohio, where a home is located, and another from Danville, Ill., where another home is located. The Members representing those districts—Mr. Cox of Ohio and Mr. Cannon of Illinois—believed the present system to be wrong and that the board should be reduced to produce proper results. Taking this action is not serving notice upon the old soldiers that they will be evicted. There will be no attempt in any way to take away from them the comforts of the homes, but the conditions will be so improved that these aging old veterans will receive better treatment under the new conditions than under the present ones.

I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. O'HAIR].

Mr. O'HAIR. Mr. Speaker, I am unable to understand any good reason for reducing the number of managers for these soldiers' homes. It can not be economy, because they draw no salary. When this law was enacted, and as long as it has been in effect, it has been considered that 11 members, with the President and 1 member of the Supreme Court ex officio, were necessary to constitute a proper body. There are 10 homes with over 20,000 soldiers in them. Now, these homes will probably be abolished by the death of the soldiers, and it will be soon enough to abolish some of the positions of managers when a home is needed no longer.

The home in my district has over 3,000 soldiers in it, and it seems to me that the argument that by eliminating certain members of this board the management will be less centralized is not good. The fact is that by eliminating six, by taking away six, the management will be centralized, and it will be nearer one-man rule, if that is the idea, than it is to-day.

There are many millions of dollars being spent each year in the maintenance of these soldiers' homes. Here are 10 men, 1 for each home, supposed to be managers. Now, those 10, I think, with probably one exception, are old soldiers or officers of the Civil War. I have heard no one say that those men have not at heart the good of these old soldiers, and I think that these soldiers' homes ought to have a man near to them, a quasi manager, at least, to whom the soldiers can report, to whom the soldiers can make appeals, instead of a small board situated somewhere—in New York or Chicago, or scattered very much, it might be, because these homes reach from California to Maine; scattered all over the country.

Mr. LOBECK. That is what they do now.

Mr. O'HAIR. I am unable to see—and that is why I speak against this proposition—the virtue of reducing the number of these managers. I think the home in my district has 3,200 soldiers in it, and it needs some man who has at heart the interests of the soldiers close at hand to look after them.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to my colleague from New York, Mr. GOULDEN.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. GOULDEN] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Speaker, with a practical experience as a trustee of one of the largest State soldiers' homes in the country I may be able to throw a little light on the subject.

I am sorry I can not agree with my distinguished friend from Maine [Mr. MCGILLICUDDY] and the equally distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. O'HAIR]. The fact is that at the national homes the men go to the homes in accordance with their personal feelings. New York State has at Togus, Me., somewhere between 100 and 200 of its old soldiers. Therefore they are a long distance from a local managing member, so called. The gentleman who is supposed to represent the Hampton Soldiers' Home in Virginia lives, as my friend from Virginia [Mr. JONES] says, in New Jersey, so that it is not required that they should be physically located so as to be able to meet these men.

In the State home in New York we had a board of 11 and reduced the number to 7, and it is working better now than when the number was larger. I have every confidence in the president of the board of managers, Maj. Wadsworth, who served long and creditably in this House, and his views, to my mind, would go far as the number is concerned. I heartily agree with him that the reduction from 11 to 5 would work good results, and I am willing to follow the suggestion of Maj. Wadsworth every time, and I am therefore in sympathy with and will support the amendment offered by the committee and adopted by this House. I trust that the amendment known as No. 2 will prevail and that the House will insist upon it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, we are "up against" the same old proposition of how to abolish a job. One would suppose that it would not be a hard thing to abolish a place which had no salary connected with it and where you did not oust the present incumbent. And yet four gentlemen whose terms have now expired—or perhaps it is only three—have been able to work up quite an agitation to keep those positions still in existence.

Last year, when three of these terms had expired, and the House had passed a resolution providing for the naming of three managers, and making a change, I believe, as to one—possibly two—even that effort to change the holder of the job from one man to another was held up. They could not pass the resolution through the Senate, and it did not pass, except with an amendment restoring the one who now holds the job holding over, so that he would have a reappointment.

Everybody knows that 5 managers will do better work than 11 managers. A board of 5 will do the work better than a board of 11 who will not do the work. That is the case now. The very theory of having a man who is supposed to be the manager for each home is wrong. He does not manage the home. There is a superintendent to manage the home. I recently read the report of the board of managers, which was quite a volume, and I also read the report of the investigation carried on by a Senate committee, of the home in California. Certainly something ought to be done. No one is proposing to affect adversely the soldiers in the homes. There is no proposition here to close a home and turn any old soldier out of a home, as suggested by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. MCGILLICUDDY]. No such idea is carried here. The purpose is to secure efficiency.

It took us a great many years to pass a law providing for the abolishment of the seven Isthmian Canal Commissioners and get it through the Senate of the United States. Every time a proposition has come up for the abolishing or reducing of these useless, unwieldy boards we have had the same kind of a contest.

In the last Congress we passed the sundry civil bill, and it went to the Senate and was there amended in many respects. The bill was sent to conference. The House conferees agreed to some amendments and the Senate conferees receded on some amendments, and the House accepted the Senate amendments which were agreed to in conference. Under those circumstances I think the Senate is under obligation, in good faith, at this time to accept the propositions of the House which were agreed to in conference before. We have taken the conference bill without question and passed it through this House.

I think we can afford occasionally to reduce the membership of a board which will be more efficient and more economical and will furnish a better service with a smaller number than it does or can with the larger number.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New Hampshire.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to take up more than a moment of the time of this House in its consideration of this amendment. I believe it is unwise for this House to adopt a penurious policy in dealing with a proposition of this kind. We should maintain a broad and liberal policy in taking care of the grandest body of men that this or any other country ever knew—the old soldiers—who, by their deeds of valor, have made this the beautiful country it is, in which we live.

We have a soldiers' home in the State of New Hampshire, which State I in part represent, that is maintained by the State itself. We have never asked the National Government to contribute one dollar toward its establishment or maintenance. In almost every city and village in the State of New Hampshire there are Grand Army posts, and in my home city of Manchester the post headquarters is furnished by the city, and is heated and lighted and the janitor service provided by the people of Manchester, who love the old soldiers and who desire to do everything possible to make their declining days comfortable.

It has been said here that we have no desire to affect injuriously the welfare of the old soldiers, and I believe that is the sentiment of this splendid body of men whom I now have the pleasure of addressing. Let us do nothing that will cause the old soldiers one moment's uneasiness or worry in their declining days. Let us, on the other hand, do everything we can to make their last days comfortable. It seems to me that, as National Legislators, we owe that much to these old soldiers. We should not adopt this recommendation for a change in the present rules, which will bring about conditions that I am sure the membership of this House does not desire, particularly in view of the fact that no financial saving to the Government will be effected.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New Hampshire has expired.

Mr. HAMMOND. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. HAMMOND. I should like to know if there are any items in this appropriation bill appropriating money that must be used in the immediate future?

Mr. FITZGERALD. There are in this bill what are known as continuing appropriations.

Mr. HAMMOND. Is there a necessity for the passage of this bill within a very few days?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not within the next 24 hours. I think this matter will be settled by Monday.

Mr. HAMMOND. I have seen a statement in the newspapers, if I am not mistaken, in connection with some appropriation included in this bill, indicating that there was an urgent necessity that the bill should be passed at a very early date.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There has been an urgent necessity that the bill should be passed since the 4th day of March, when it should have become a law. In my opinion, it should not have been vetoed. The House expressed its opinion to that effect by its vote. If the gentleman expects me to say that I think it is more important that the House should concur in the Senate amendment rather than that the bill go over until Monday, I can not accommodate him, because I believe it to be of more importance that this amendment of the Senate be defeated than that this bill become a law to-day. There are continuing appropriations—appropriations for river and harbor work, for instance—in this bill.

Mr. HAMMOND. The gentleman thinks that this matter of decreasing the number of members upon this board from 11 to 5 is of so much importance that these appropriations should be delayed further than they have been?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do. I hold in my hand, Mr. Speaker, the report of a Senate committee made last January—since gentlemen wish to bring such matters into this discussion—pursuant to a resolution of the Senate directing the Senate committee to investigate one of these homes—to investigate it because of the innumerable complaints that had been made of the treatment of the old soldiers in it, and I shall read some of the findings of the committee as to conditions under the present system.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I should like to finish this statement.

Mr. REED. I just wish to say to the gentleman——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I decline to yield at present. Here are some of the findings made by this committee after investigating the Pacific Home, at Santa Monica, Cal., as a result of which I think the governor was removed. A member of the board lives in Pasadena, Cal., and he is the local manager of the home. I read from the tenth finding:

The conditions in the general homes are far from satisfactory. The food is often badly cooked and badly served. There are two sittings at each meal, with about 750 men at each sitting. No water is available during the meal. No sugar or cream or milk is placed on the table.

Then further along down in the report is the following:

The bread is generally heavy, soggy, and unattractive in appearance. The bread pans did not appear to be suitable.
